TRASH TALK

Damn, enough with these tiebreakers. Let me explain the situation for those who missed last week's trash talk.

For the second straight week, two people tied for the lead in the NFL picks. This time, it was Martignetti and myself. The tiebreaker, for the second straight week, was the total amount of points scored in the Monday night game between the Panthers and the Packers. And, for the second straight week, Adam lost the tiebreaker. The total amount of points scored in the game was 45. Adam took 39 points, while I took 41.

While writing this article is nice, and getting out of the cellar of the picks for the year is even nicer, I hate ties. You don't lose, but you don't win outright. You have to share a piece of the pie with someone else, and I can't stand that. I want the whole pie to myself, with not a crumb left for anybody else. I hate ties almost as much as I hate it when people dress up their pets in public. (Cause the pets look thrilled when they are dressed up).

It is a common bond that is shared by everyone mentioned in this article. We can't stand ties.

Although, come to think of it, the way Adam White is going right now, he would be happy with a tie of any sort. Can you imagine someone with a 10 game lead earlier on the season falling into last place with four weeks left in the season? It is almost humanly impossible. However, we are talking about White here. He makes things that are meant to be impossible a thing of reality, and his abysmal performance in the second half of the season has proven that fact. Nice job Adam.

Ties leave you with a bad taste in your mouth like you just saw something that you do not like and just want to erase it from memory. Case in point, Smitty, who I want to permanently want to erase from memory. But it is tougher for me to do it than him. It would probably take me years of therapy to erase him from memory. All he has to do is go to a party on any night of the week, grab his first drink and "Whoomp, there it is," in no time flat, you are forgotten.

To me, ties are worse than having someone who knows nothing about football winning the NFL picks. This leads us to Wilkinson, who somehow is leading this disaster by four games with a month left. When it comes to everything else, he has the brains of Homer Simpson, but when it comes to picking the games, "Look out, here comes Inspector Gadget." He can solve everything without even trying. The rest of us should be ashamed of ourselves for letting Homer catapult himself into the lead. That's a disgrace.

To me, ties are worse than watching Dawson's Creek. Unfortunately, that rationale has not hit Martignetti yet. I am glad that I got the tiebreaker because if I didn't, there probably would not have been a trash talk this week, since Adam would have been sitting in front of his TV sipping his hot cocoa and watching his Dawson. We here at "Trash Talk" pray for the best in the future for Adam, because with Dawson's Creek, his present isn't looking particularly good.

But enough about ties let me give you a couple of picks:

The big game happens tonight as the Detroit Lions (8-4) take on the Minnesota Vikings (10-2). The spread is nine points, which might be a little too high, but the Vikings offense is clicking right now and I think that they will score enough points to cover. Give me the Vikings.

Another game of note locally is the 3-9 Patriots against the Kansas City Chiefs on Monday Night. I have not picked the Pats since Week 6, but they are playing the Chiefs, who I feel are going to sink after the lost to San Diego last week. Giving a point, give me New England.

Horoscopes

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Your own confidence and self-admiration may get in your way today. Be willing to the advice and guidance of others at this time.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Be careful that you don't get signals crossed today. It may be quite easy for others to misinterpret your intentions. Be clear and concise.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Someone is willing to provide for you in more ways than desired today – but you must make yourself available for such hands-on assistance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Tap into your leadership qualities today. There are many scattered individuals in your orbit today. You can surely harness their energies and money.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – What seems to be in order today may prove, when put to the test, to be out of sync with your current needs and desires. Changes are in order.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You can take advantage of a social situation today to promote a personal project – but you must do in a way that doesn't smack of opportunism.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Your devil-may-care attitude may not be appropriate at this time. Do your best to assume an air that others do not find abrasive.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Take care you don't take yourself so seriously today that you are unable to recognize an opportunity for fun that comes your way unexpectedly.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Try not to be too stubborn with a loved one today. Remember that he or she is sharing those opinions for a reason. Even though their obsession with Pac-man may be a little strange to you, listen to them.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You can unlock far greater personal potential today simply by concentrating a little more and working just a little harder.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may have a tendency to be pensive and moody today. It is all right to be quiet and thoughtful, but guard against sinking into a funk.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You won't be able to second-guess the competition today, but you should be able to keep up when it comes to coming up with creative solutions.

SGA committees keep working despite conflicts

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

With rumors flying high, and a Student Government Association on pins and needles awaiting the Judiciary's outcome, questions about the overall productivity of the SGA remain.

With the Ways of Means Committee making leeway and continuing to move forward, as explained by Chair Mike Taugher, other committees have also taken it upon themselves to try to work beyond the commotion.

The University Policy Committee has been working on issues revolving around the Mullins Center's track and field. Chair of University Policy Michael Whitehouse explained that the track is unsuitable for the UMass track team or any other athletic department.

"Right now the track is in disrepair and the track team can't practice on it," Whitehouse said. "It affects recruiting that takes place, and it affects the other athletic departments who are trying to raise support."

Other issues addressed by the University Policy Committee and the Administrative Affairs Committee were the overall safety issues at the Summit on Safety meeting held at UMass.

"We're looking into the escort services and increasing the number of drivers. Chief of Police John Luippold explained how there were not enough wages to pay for more drivers, so we're looking into a possible waivable fee for students to pay," Whitehouse said. "If we added on an option to pay extra, we could raise an extra $80,000-$100,000 to be used to higher or increase wages for those working for the escort services."

Whitehouse and Lieutenant Governor of the commuter area, Jason Malstrom, explained that they are looking into several possible motions to bring forth to the Senate.

"We wrote a motion regarding the credit deficit and how to help it so that pre-registration would go much easier," Malstrom said. "It's hard for students who don't have enough credits, or enough time to track down their academic advisor. We want to get rid of this policy or tailor it to the students' academic plan."

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority was also a topic of discussion. Whitehouse explained changes that his committee is trying to make to ensure safety for all students.

"Right now the PVTA does not stop in certain locations on Friday and Saturday nights due to safety issues," Whitehouse explained. "Now the buses are equipped with video cameras and police officers on Saturday and Sunday nights. It's a safety issue with students, because without buses or transportation, they are more likely to drive drunk."

Areas of the Executive are also looking toward the future, beyond the Judiciary decision. Secretary of Administrative Affairs, Sheila Tunney, explained her plans to form a Women's Issues Committee. The proposal was brought forth before the Senate in order to gain support.

"I'm putting together a luncheon in order to get together and see what is and isn't being done on campus," Tunney said. "I've talked to the Every Woman's Center and Campus Housing and am looking to get others involved as well."

Tunney stated the reasons for forming this committee and what its purpose would be in regards to the UMass student body.

"It's going to focus on how the University accommodates women and men who have been subject to any act of violence," Tunney said. "We'll also focus on how students can access resources to get help and report instances in a situation comfortable to each student."

A date and place for this event has yet to be decided.

Scott speaks to faculty at Senate mtg.

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David Scott is getting good at surprising people.

After surprising the campus by announcing his resignation earlier in the week, he surprised the Faculty Senate by attending yesterday's meeting after his appearance had been cancelled yesterday.

Just before the meeting was called to order, Secretary of the Senate Ernest May informed Presiding Officer Frank Hugus that Scott would be making an announcement. A motion was made to change the agenda to allow the Chancellor to speak.

Scott began his announcement by thanking the assembly.

"We have appreciated the many kind thoughts and emails for our son Jeremy," said Scott. "They [Baystate Medical Center] say he is halfway through his first operation and doing well, and we thank you."

Scott's son Jeremy was hospitalized after being seriously injured in a fall.

"It became clear to me in the last few weeks," Scott said about his resignation. "I did not feel comfortable in talking about long range planning, especially ten year planning when I knew I wasn't going to be here after July 1."

Scott then outlined his plans for the rest of the year.

"I'll work on the strengths and weaknesses of this campus, identifying areas of investment," said Scott. "I will do whatever the President and the Board of Trustees feels appropriate. After all, I answer to the President."

Scott produced a volume of poetry and donned a pair of reading glasses.

"At times like this, I find it useful to read poetry, and I'd like to read some here," prefaced Scott.

"'Meanwhile the world goes on. Meanwhile the sun and the clear pebbles of the rain are moving across the landscapes, over the prairies and the deep trees, the mountains and the rivers. Meanwhile the wild geese, high in the clean blue air, are heading home again.'" Scott read from Mary Oliver's poem "Wild Geese."

Scott concluded his remarks to the Senate, expressing his feelings for the University.

"It has been a pleasure, and we will always be cheering for the University of Massachusetts," Scott explained.

In response, the Faculty Senate passed a resolution thanking the Chancellor and congratulating him on his leadership of the campus.

The Senate then moved on to its regular business. First on the agenda was a motion concerning the Stockbridge School of Agriculture. The Senate approved changing the academic criteria concerning academic good standing. Previously, Stockbridge had a varying grade point average system to determine academic standing by semester. Stockbridge will now use the 2.00 benchmark used by the rest of the University.

Chancellor Scott receives praise at the faculty senate meeting for his efforts over the past eight years.

UMass Online, the University's distance learning program, was also discussed. The Council on University Service, Public Service and Outreach submitted several recommendations to the Senate for its consideration.

The Council advocated a decentralized approach to the system, assigning tasks to individual campuses. The motion carried. Chair Peter d'Errico commented on the relationship between the Faculty Senate and the President's Office on the issue of distance learning.

"Initially they [the President's office] had not given much concern at all to the faculty role of governance," d'Errico said. "I think we've moved a long way since then. I think the President's office publicly understands the role is based on the campus level for faculty."

The Athletic Council distributed its Annual Report, sparking a line of questioning concerning funding for athletics.

"According to the financial report I have, there's a $900,000 deficit.

Wait for results continues as Fla. legislature meets

By Chris Thompson

A special committee of the Florida legislature recommended yesterday that an emergency session of the legislature be held to decide whether or not to appoint the state's 25 electors, who ultimately will elect the next President.

Meeting for the third consecutive day, the committee, majority Republican, voted to recommend the special session, despite objections from its Democratic members who claimed the action was taken to assure the victory of George W. Bush.

The proposal attracted criticism from Democratic Vice-Presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman. Lieberman claimed the legislature was "prepared to put their judgment in place of the judgment of six million voters of Florida."

"It threatens to put us into a constitutional crisis, which we are not in now by any stretch of the word," Lieberman said.

Florida Governor Jeb Bush, younger brother to George W., said yesterday that he would sign a bill passed by the legislature naming the state's electors. Bush ultimately must sign any bill passed by the legislature for it to take effect.

Lawyers representing Gore petitioned the Florida Supreme Court yesterday to hear its case contesting the election in Florida and calling for a recount of disputed ballots in Miami-Dade and Palm Beach counties. Circuit Court Judge N. Sanders Sauls refused to hear the Gore case until Saturday, prompting the Gore attorneys to appeal to the higher court for an accelerated court schedule.

In accordance with Judge Sauls' ruling, Palm Beach County's roughly 462,000 ballots were shipped to the capital of Tallahassee yesterday. The ballots were shipped in a rental truck and escorted by police cruisers and motorcycles as well as various members of the media.

Judge Saul ruled that the ballots in Miami-Dade and Palm Beach counties should be impounded and transferred to Tallahassee. Miami-Dade County planned to ship its approximately 654,000 ballots today.

The U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments from both camps today on whether or not the Florida Supreme Court overstepped its authority by extending Florida's vote certification deadline.

Bush's lawyers have contended that the Florida Court violated the separation of powers, usurping the authority of the legislature to set the certification date. Gore's lawyers have responded that the Court was interpreting conflicting statutes—one setting the deadline for certification a week after election day, the other calling for a manual recount of votes in a close race.

The high court has instructed both legal teams to focus on the constitutional questions: whether Bush's rights to due process under the 14th amendment were violated by recounts in disproportionally Democratic counties, and whether the Florida Supreme Court violated Article II Section 1 of the U.S. Constitution, which gives state legislatures the authority to decide how state electors are chosen.

Gore's lawyers have insisted that the case remains a state matter and that the federal court should not get involved.

NAACP responds to Florida election fiasco

By Rachael Delvaney
Collegian Staff

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) decided Wednesday to pursue "injunctive relief" for people of color through the Florida court system, for the violation of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which guarantees equal access to the ballot box.

Throughout Election Day many complaints of voting irregularities came from African American voters in Florida and Missouri to the NAACP and have caused many civil rights leaders and organizations to react. NAACP President Kweisi Mfume told reporters at the NAACP headquarters in Baltimore that in the next week there would be several lawsuits being filed.

"We want a court order to make Florida assure the right of every qualified citizen to cast a ballot and to have it counted," said Mfume.

Kweisi Mfume

Civil Rights leaders and organizations say that other problems, such as a lack of technology in predominately black precincts, a high amount of police presence in black neighborhoods and the late delivery of voter cards to students at Bethune-Cookman College in Daytona Beach also had effects on the discouragement of voters.

African American citizens such as Dedrana McCray, 18, of Miami Florida expressed that county offices turned her away because her name could not be found on their master list.

McRay was a part of the substantial amount of African American citizens in Florida who wanted to participate in the biggest voter turnout in decades. The NAACP alone raised over $10 million toward this year's voter drive, and despite these efforts, many African American people were denied their voting rights.

According to interviews, election officials across Florida, like David Leahy, the supervisor of elections in Miami-Dade County, said that they do not know why McCray's name had been edited from the precinct-voting list.

The NAACP and Civil Rights leaders and activists across the nation are outraged at the silence and the lack of examination on the part of the Justice Department, and U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno, for the alleged suppression of minority voting rights.

Jesse Jackson

When both the Republican and Democratic parties did not respond to requests for a public hearing of all counties to investigate wrongdoing at the polls, the NAACP took their own accord. A five-hour hearing on the part of the NAACP was held, and concluded that people of color were prevented from voting, and were lied to at the poles.

Because of these unfavorable acts towards people of color, the NAACP, and Civil Rights leader, Reverend Jesse Jackson, will be planning a protest and march from the Justice Department to the U.S. Supreme Court in Washington this afternoon, in addition to lawsuits coming up next week.

"Given the Justice Department's silence, we are now prepared to go to court and file suits to seek legal remedies that will determine what happened during this election, and we are taking the steps to prevent a recurrence," said Mfume.

Jewish Student Union dances into winter with semi-formal

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

The Jewish Student Union is sponsoring a Winter Semi-Formal tomorrow, Dec. 2 at 8 p.m. in the campus center.

Rebecca Russell, the Administrative Vice President for the Jewish Student Union is very excited about the event. "I'd like to see a lot of people come out, have fun, meet new people," she said. It's just a fun relaxing thing during a stressful time of the year."

Russell anticipates around seventy-five students to attend, but really hopes more will find the time to check things out. She said that the very active people in the Jewish Student Union will most definitely attend the event, but she really hopes that new people come as well. "If a lot of people who aren't usually active show up it's great because we get a chance to meet new people," she said.

Russell said that it is common to rely on the active people at the Jewish Student Union to be there, and noted that there are around 3,000 Jewish students on campus. "We only see about 300 of those people, and even less are regulars," she said. "It's not a sad thing though, because the people who are active really love what they do and we know each other very well. Unfortunately what happens is that people find out about us their senior year here, like what we do, and then have to leave."

Tickets for the Semi-Formal cost $7 if purchased in advance, and $9 when bought at the door. The Jewish Student Union charges just enough money to break even with the event's costs, so they do not make any money off of it for themselves.

At the Semi-Formal, they will be having DJ Fooz, who has been the DJ at many other RSO's events, and lives in the area. Russell said that he is wonderful, and is a DJ at the Monkey Bar in Amherst.

As for other events that Jewish Student Union is planning, on Dec. 12, 13, and 14 they are holding a "mini mall" in the campus center. They will also be having a Hanukkah party on Dec. 14th. Next semester they hope to have a mock wedding with a comedian officiate. Every Friday night, they hold weekly services. All events are open to the entire campus.

If nothing else, the Jewish Student Union boasts that their Winter Semi-Formal is nothing like regular dances. "A lot of semi-formals are a time to come out and show off how you look and who you're with. This isn't like that," Russell said. "It's much more relaxing."

Senator Jack Tagiel asked Professor Rod Warnick, who was delivering the report for the Council, if they were running a program that is losing money. When Warnick confirmed that they were, Tagiel asked about the program's accountant.

Senator Brian O'Connor also had concerns about the Athletic program.

"There are ten home games, and none are selling out. O'Connor said, referring to the men's basketball team.

The Athletic Department is trying to generate enough revenue to cover their costs but that doesn't always happen, so sometimes we have to run a deficit," explained Warnick.

Warnick had several reasons for the shortfall and the declining attendance rates.

"Basketball being off somewhat; that certainly hurt us. Four or five years ago we were doing really well. The basketball program was doing really well. We need more money," he explained.

The Athletic Department has to be more creative when selling tickets," O'Connor replied.

O'Connor recommended lowering ticket prices in the hopes of selling more tickets, and creating discounted family packages to bolster attendance.

"I think you have to take into perspective that we have a very broad based program. We have a lot of scholarships to cover," Warnick said.

Search for Bulger brother intensifies

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The search for James "Whitey" Bulger, the brother of University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, has become more intense with an increase of information award money.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) announced on Wednesday that it would offer $1 million for any information leading to the arrest of Bulger, a member of the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list. This reward, which was increased from an original information offer of $250,000, makes him the seventh person in the history of the organization to have a payment of that magnitude offered for his return.

The organization, which currently has a total budget of $3 billion and 11,000 employees, has assigned one agent specifically to the Whitey Bulger case along with a Boston police officer and a state patrol officer. The organization is currently searching for additional help in the pursuit of him.

Allegedly Bulger and his associate Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi ran a crime group known as the Winter Hill Gang, and ran its operations out of Boston from the late 1970's until present day. The group generated money through racketeering, money laundering, extortion, loan-sharking and drug sales. Many of these offenses are on Bulger's personal list of crimes.

The FBI has unsuccessfully tracked him for roughly six years following his flight in 1995 for an alleged 18 murders, 10 killings and the potential corruption of FBI agents—one of whom may have tipped him off to a potential indictment against him, causing him to flee. Both Bulger and Flemmi, who were free from prosecution for many years while they acted as FBI informants offering up information regarding the Mafia, are now on the run.

Bulger, who is now 71 years of age, is thought to be traveling with his girlfriend Catherine Elizabeth Greig, who is also being prosecuted criminally for harboring a federal fugitive.

The FBI has received 1,500 tips since Bulger disappeared and he has been spotted in New York City, Wyoming, Mississippi, Chicago, New Orleans and a slew of other places. The last place that he was seen was in Fountain Valley, California.

"He's a very, very clever guy," Charles Prouty, Head of the Boston FBI Bureau said in a statement to the Associated Press. "He blends in; he is a very clever criminal. There is speculation he has prepared for this fugitive status for years and he may have stashed money throughout the country."

Anyone who provides information relating to the capture of Bulger will remain anonymous.

Some '80s fashions not so forgettable

By Caitlin Friedemann
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. — The 80's were a decade of fabulous fashion and extreme glamour. Runway shows featured everything from berets and dark eyeliner to huge permed hairstyles and power suits.

But how did this trickle down to affect the fashion sense of millions of American children who grew up during the 80's?

"Leggings and big sweatshirts!" exclaimed University of Michigan LSA sophomore Aimee Niebuhr.

Of course this outfit would not be complete without two pairs of different colored socks or some legwarmers. Leggings were definitely a staple, and they came in the full '80s palate—from black to hot pink, electric blue and neon green. In hotter weather, they looked really radical with a T-shirt tied at the side.

"I had this one shirt that said 'Party Time' and it was hot pink and black with a picture of a girl deciding what to wear," LSA sophomore Louisa Kennedy said.

What girl could ever forget multiples, those awesome three-piece outfits of leggings, a long T-shirt and a wide fabric belt?

For the lucky ones who had their ears pierced, big hoop earrings were the fad, with a side ponytail or crimped or feathered hair (perfection was achieved with a crimped side ponytail). To complete the female outfit, a pair of running shoes, preferably a pair of leather high tops, was a requirement. One could judge a person by whether their high tops were Reebok or I.A Gear.

Boys were also judged by this "sneaker standard," and most guys also owned neon shoelaces to go with their shoes. Many wore Zubaz, those zebra-striped or crazy-patterned pants.

"The girls loved my matching sweat suits," LSA freshman Jon Schwartz said.

If one did decide to wear jeans, however, Girbaud were the only option.

Boys had a wide range of tops to choose from. "I used to wear a big leather vest that I thought was the height of coolness," said LSA sophomore Joey Litman.

Hard-rock band T-shirts were cool, and anything Hypercolor (it changed color with the temperature) was also very popular. Crew cuts spiked with a pound of gel or hairspray completed the look for boys.

Although they did not progress as far as Madonna's spandex, denim and lace ensembles or Billy Idol's mohawk and ripped clothing, children's attire during the '80s definitely went to the extremes of neon color and bad taste.

"At the time I felt like a rock star, but now when I look back, I kind of shudder," LSA sophomore Liz Herek said.

Tufts students end sit-in after pres. affirms nondiscrimination policy

By Jacob Silberberg
Tufts Daily (Tufts U.)

(U-WIRE) MEDFORD, Mass. — Tufts University President John DiBiaggio sent out a mass e-mail to the Tufts community Wednesday affirming specific sections of Tufts' nondiscrimination policy. In particular areas covering self-acceptance of identity. The statement prompted the 20 students who staged a 35-hour sit-in in Bendetson Hall to end their protest and claim victory in their battle to get the administration to address the issue of discrimination on campus.

During the protest, the students, most of whom are members of the group formerly known as Tufts Students Against Discrimination (TSAD), demanded that the administration affirm two aspects of the nondiscrimination policy: self-acceptance of one's identity and the applicability of the policy to external organizations operating at Tufts. DiBiaggio met with a team of student negotiators during the day and released a statement meeting those conditions at 5:15 p.m.

"I want to state clearly and succinctly for the record, that Tufts has a rigorous and comprehensive nondiscrimination policy that has worked well for many years," DiBiaggio wrote. "I further want to emphasize that the University's existing nondiscrimination policy encourages individuals to accept their identity on the basis of their gender, sexual orientation, race, color, religion, disability and ethnic origin, and supports individuals in doing so and I affirm that the nondiscrimination policy is understood to include such self-acceptance of identity."

The protestors left the administration building at 7:30 p.m. and were met by approximately 30 students and faculty who greeted them with applause. Julie Catalano, the student whose complaint of discrimination against the Tufts Christian Fellowship (TCF) last spring started this controversy, was the second student to leave the building.

As she exited, Catalano shouted "I got my policy". Although she declined to comment specifically on the TCF, she did say that she was once again proud to be a student at Tufts.

TSAD held a brief press conference after it relinquished the admissions office during which senior Courtney Young read a statement and the president's letter.

"This entire thing, it went like a dream. We had been planning this for two months," said Dan Barry, student negotiator. "We got the interpretation of the policy we wanted."

While students were quick to point out that the administration did not lose, they did say that both of their demands for clarification of the policy were met.

TSAD's concerns about the nondiscrimination policy came after TCF's decision on a complaint by Catalano that she had been excluded from a leadership position in TCF because of her sexual orientation. TCF is affiliated with the national organization InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, and InterVarsity played a role in the exclusion of Catalano from TCF - leadership.

The TCF wrote in its Oct. 16 decision that the University's policy as it stood could not be interpreted to protect students' specific beliefs. Many students felt that this ruling voided the nondiscrimination policy because it separated identity from the belief in the legitimacy of that identity and therefore opened the community up to widespread discrimination. These students united to form TSAD, and they immediately began to demand that the administration address the issue.

The sit-in was the last in a string of events designed to provoke administrative action, including protesting on the library roof, filling the quad and delivering nearly 2,000 petitions to the president. After two months of meetings with the administration, TSAD members became frustrated and made plans for the latest protest.

We weren't making any progress we were just on different wavelengths," Young said.

The sit-in at TSAD stormed the admissions office at 9 a.m. Tuesday, vowing not to move until the administration agreed to their demands. Negotiations took place throughout the day Tuesday, but DiBiaggio was out of town and therefore unable to participate in them.

Throughout the day on Tuesday, students say the police threatened them with arrest. At 5 p.m., approached students say the police threatened to arrest them for trespassing. The doors to the admissions office were locked and 16 students spent the night inside. A police officer inside sat reading a book as the student slept in sleeping bags. Other students kept vigil outside, some sleeping in a tent. On Wednesday morning, students were woken by Dean of Students Binx Reitman.

Dean Reitman showed up at 7:45 a.m. We woke up," Young said. "We had a conference with him. He said that we could go meet with the president in his office at 1:30 p.m. We said no. If we leave the building they're going to lock the doors."

Instead, DiBiaggio came to Bendetson to meet with the protestors. He emerged from the talks optimistic, saying that he expected to resolve the problem by the end of the day.

Just because sex sells doesn't make it right

On the back cover of yesterday's Collegian you probably noticed a very large, very vivid photograph of Claudia Schiffer wearing nothing but underwear. It was hard to miss. It was an ad our business department accepted from H & M in the Holyoke Mall.

To be sure, the ad in the Collegian isn't an anomaly. Such an image of a woman, scantily clad or not clad at all, dominates all forms of media. Regardless of the product, it is a function in our economy that consistently sells.

The Collegian, like most forms of print media, exists solely because of the money it collects from ads. It's not hard to fathom the costs for printing and distributing a daily paper of our size. The need and significance of every ad, subsequently, is absolute.

But that doesn't mean the Collegian condones the marketing approach of H & M and the many other companies that also rely on photographs like the one in yesterday's paper to make money.

It seems obvious to perceive a full page, color photo of a woman in her underwear on the back cover of a newspaper as an unfortunate thing.

And yet this type of image is easily found in everything from the New York Times to a local daily. So, perhaps, the implications of it aren't obvious to everyone.

It's hard to know who to blame in this issue.

Media management is an easy target. Maybe they aren't aware that such an image can be construed as offensive. Maybe they haven't noticed the struggle women have endured, and still endure, for true equality. Maybe they don't realize that images like this perpetuate the notion that women exist primarily, if not solely, to fulfill a sexual role. Maybe they cannot comprehend how images like these dictate a standard of how women should look and, as a result, have made a majority of women feel inadequate or uncomfortable.

Although someone, somewhere is responsible for providing these images, we, as consumers, are just as accountable for taking their bait. Our responses, if not wholly then mostly, determine what marketing teams design and, in turn, what newspapers, like the Collegian, have to put on their pages.

The Collegian doesn't claim to have a solution to this problem because it is one that reaches far back in history, and although we have made substantial steps to improve circumstances for women, the ideal has not yet been achieved.

However, we do feel that awareness is the only effective way to address this issue. If those who don't find a photograph of a naked woman advertising anything from jewelry, to cars, to fur coats disturbing could hear why such an image is harmful, understanding would heighten and as a result sensitivity would, too.

Although H & M, and any company, for that matter, has the right to advertise their products in any way they desire, the Collegian doesn't excuse it. We apologize for using that ad in our paper and since our ethics don't include exploiting women, in the future we hope to maintain better taste in all facets of our publication.

Night of homelessness

CHRISSY FRASER

I'm from California and therefore am not familiar with winter here in the Northeast. Winter temperatures in Northern California typically range in the low 60's. So I don't think I was fully prepared for the conditions I would face sleeping outside in the middle of November.

My friends and peers warned me during the weeks leading up to the event but I was determined to go forward with the plans and could only hope that more students would willingly join me in the effort to raise awareness about homelessness. On Nov. 17, eight students from UMass gathered on the lawn in front of the library to participate in an event called "One Night Without a Home." The event was sponsored by the MassPIRG Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness. We met at 7 p.m. on Friday night with intentions of staying until 7 a.m. the following morning. We were joined by Matthew, a homeless man from Boston, whom I met about a month ago in a community service learning class called Homelessness and Shelter. I was wearing several layers of clothes and socks but they didn't stop the wind from stinging my face, or the rest of my body for that matter. People brought sleeping bags and pillows and we sprawled out on tarps under the impression that the tarps would keep our sleeping bags from soaking up moisture from the grass. However, the tarps didn't prevent frost from covering everything in the early hours of the morning, including the tops of our sleeping bags!

The night started with a vigil in which we read poems written by high school students and former homeless people. A discussion followed in which we shared personal experiences and thoughts about how the problem is treated in our communities—everything from misconceptions about the homeless to fears and possible solutions. Then Matthew shared his story and this was the most poignant part of the evening. He talked about how he became homeless and about his perspective on the problem. One of things he said that stands out most in my mind is that what homeless people need even more than food is someone to listen to them. He also commented that charity organizations focus so much on providing food and other essentials for the homeless that sometimes, to him, it seems like the real need is not being addressed. That is the need for shelter and not merely temporary shelter but rather permanent housing solutions. Matthew said that Boston is widely perceived by homeless people nationwide as being "hobo heaven" because there is such an abundance of soup kitchens and places to get free goods like clothes. There and other thoughts that Matthew shared indicated that more emphasis needs to be placed on developing permanent housing solutions for the homeless.

Throughout the rest of the night we talked, asked questions, shared thoughts on how to implement change and how to motivate others to get involved in the fight to end homelessness. We munched on peanut butter and jelly sandwiches, too. Twelve people attended the event, eight of which slept out. Some of them saw the banner and walked over to find out what it was all about. Others stayed for several hours and then left. One guy walked by, saw the banner, gave us a $1, and said, "Thank you for doing this." Oh yes, the event was a fundraiser as well. Participants had the option of getting people to sponsor them. We raised a total of $187.00 by collecting from students in the dorms.

So if you are one of the people who gave a donation, thank you very much for your support. The money will be going to the Survival Center in Amherst.

Temperatures dropped throughout the night. Some people were able to sleep but I know I couldn't. My mind kept focusing on how much my toes stung and I couldn't figure out how I could be all bundled up and still feel a draft. At 4 a.m. I peeked out from beneath my sleeping bag and saw frost on everything. I had to use the bathroom so I went to the Campus Center with another student and we both agreed that we didn't want to lie down again because It was actually warmer if we kept moving around. So we walked in circles around the lawn for the next hour talking about Matthew's story and generating ideas on things students can do to help implement change and to raise awareness. One idea is to have a "reverse" soup kitchen here on campus in which homeless people serve students a meal instead of the other way around. The object is to spend some time in someone else's shoes. Around 5:30 a.m. everyone started waking up, and having come to our senses, we agreed unanimously to pack up and return to our dorms, just an hour and a half shy of the scheduled end, 7 a.m.. I was really surprised that we lasted as long as we did—10 and a half hours!

Matthew told us about his experience during the first few nights he spent homeless, three and a half years ago. The first night he was exhausted. The second night he felt physical pain, mostly a result of the cold temperatures. The third night is when fear set in. Many people might be wondering how sleeping outside accomplished anything for the homeless or might be questioning the notion that one night outside could give anyone a real glimpse at what it would be like to be homeless. I asked myself the same questions during the weeks leading up to the event. Having participated in the experience and witnessed seven others as well, I can tell you that we began with the realization that one night would in no way be comparable to the real experience of being homeless. However, I can guarantee you that we came away with a better understanding and even more passion to ensure that no one should ever have to spend a night without shelter.

Seasons Greetings from Ed/Op!

Little green Gore-bot

GEORGE THOMAS

Enough already! Is the election going to drag on forever? And then it came to me—the solution to our problem. Actually, it came in a dream. Obviously overwrought by the election, I was having nightmares: Al Gore as president. It was as if Jimmy Carter and Richard Nixon had morphed into one: there was a flood of meaningless fact after meaningless fact, interspersed with an insistence that Constitution or no Constitution he represented the will of the people—and anyone who disagreed would be destroyed.

I dreamt that Gore was an alien from another planet.

I was reading the news this morning, when it hit me. This is not a dream; Al Gore is an alien. My evidence, at this point, is admittedly circumstantial; although solid indeed compared to Gore's own accusations of voter "irregularities." The fact that Gore's an alien not only explains an awful lot, it has the distinct virtue of making him ineligible for the presidency. This is no lacksonian demagoguery of voting ballot in Florida, this is an airtight constitution issue. The president must be a "natural born citizen." Aliens don't count.

Then again, Gore might not be an alien. He could well be a robot. In fact, all in all, I think this is the most plausible explanation. I'm sure once we get lawyers snooping around in Tennessee and Washington D.C., something will turn up. My theory is that Gore senior, a distinguished Senator whose presidential ambitions were thwarted, decided to create the perfect candidate, a robot with everything we want from a president and none of those all-too-human hang ups: you know, emotion, humor, principle. Perhaps that's why Gore senior could say that Gore junior, at a ripe six years of age, would one day be president. And a robot can also be programmed to fit the circumstances, which has the great advantage of explaining Gore's own erratic behavior. Only, he lacks the human touch.

Perhaps we've simply overlooked the obvious. When he speaks, his head stiffly shifts along, chin angled, but the upper chest and arms, oddly move along with it, it's as if machinery is rotating. When he tries to point his finger in the air like Bill Clinton imitating JFK, the motion is all wrong: it's stiff and jerky—hinged elbows, I'd say. And the cadence of his speech is a ringer for those computerized programs where the words fit, but there's no flow: "Under...MY...program...UNLIKE..." Robots, you see, can't slur their words and they're not always attuned to slang.

You can, however, get different personality settings: populist with a pitchfork, thoughtful environmental intellectual, Alpha male, and policy wonk. Simply hit the switch and you get the character you need for the day. Why else were there fifty-two Al Gore's running for the presidency?

And I ask you, would a human being, let alone a well-mannered Southerner, loudly sigh, again and again, in the middle of his opponent's answers in a debate? Of course not. A robot set on arrogance know-it-all would. When this didn't go well, they changed the setting to restrained and thoughtful, and then bully Alpha male. And he's always trying to show his human side. You would too if you were a robot. You too would wear an earth-toned suit and kiss your wife in front of millions of viewers.

And what about a moral conscience? Robots don't have one, unless they're programmed to. But remember, he was programmed to win, so conscience wasn't an option. So when Gore is rather obviously lying—and he knows it—it doesn't affect him as it would a human being. He can say anything with a straight face because he has no sense of shame. Comparing management to a bagel? Democracy to a word processor? Robot. Compare him to the very human Clinton, who had the remarkable ability to convince himself, despite mounds of evidence, that he wasn't, in fact, lying.

Now I admit at this point there is no hard evidence. However, there's at least as much legal merit to this claim as there is to Gore's own legal shenanigans before the courts. If the dimpled ballot theory works, why not the robot theory? And how do we know that all those bewildered elderly voters in Palm Beach—who read the National Inquire—aren't aliens themselves, acting for their leader? So let us simply convince a court that Gore is a robot or alien, I'm not particular. Bush wins by default and this thing is finally over. Worried the American public won't buy it? Relax. More of them believe in extraterrestrial life than not. Haven't you seen the "X-Files"? In fact, maybe Gore was created by some Hollywood types who want to seize power in Washington.

Holiday rants and shouts

KATIE LANDERS

People want to see themselves in the paper—their names, at least. In the time that I have been writing for the Collegian I have had many requests to talk about certain people or groups in my column.

My normal response is, "I'm lucky for the space that I get to talk about what I want. I'm not just going to write an article about you."

Well I'm a little more polite than that, but it's what I'm thinking.

I've racked my brain on something good to talk about this week. I have just finished a long paper for my American Political Thought class on Mark Twain and Andrew Jackson (imagine how exciting that was), so I'm a little short on the thought process. Stop laughing, and I know who's saying you're always short on thinking. Yep, you're wicked funny. I've decided that this week I am going to give everyone the opportunity to have his or her name in the paper with a little quip about something that relates to that person and myself. So go ahead and search the page for your name. If you told me to mention you, then you're there. If I didn't, let me know and I'll get you next semester.

First, I want to let everyone know that I schooled Douglas Tybursk in basketball. That's right, the bos has no skills. We've been discussing another game, but I don't think he'll ever pick a time. My trash talk scares him. I mas not have great height, and I'm terrible at basketball, but Doug was no match for me. Just imagine how bad he is.

Matt Wiffen is one of the coolest kids to ever come out of St. Johns Shrewsbury. Every time I see this boy we joke about the first time we met. Don't worry Matt; I wasn't going to send him after you.

I already fit Rob Daly into one of my articles, but there is always room for more. If you're ever looking for a good kid to hangout with, Rob's around. He's probably the nicest guy I've met at UMass. Rob—you're mad chill (you'll even pick up some of his coin phrases). Just don't bad talk "The Simpson's." Bad news.

Allison Yee and Maggie Ranieri have asked me all semester to get them in the paper, so the time is past due. I met Allison at freshmen orientation, the time I was pushed down the hill after the writing exam and nearly deconstructed my knee just after it was fixed (I swear. A lot of you sophomores probably saw it happen). She helped me all the way back to get my stuff and helped me walk to the car. Maggie is the sweetest girl I've met this semester, coming in close to Colleen Gilligan who is the nicest girl alive. Just keep holding that paper up in Legal Studies Maggie, and he won't be able to see you.

Ashlye Cheschi, you rock. You're closer to me than anyone here.

I'm not really sure what to put in about Eric Krans. He's got enough stories for me to write a whole column about, but I won't. Keep wearing the hemp necklace, kid.

If you get to Fenway Park next season make sure you look for Luke Antolini. He's supposedly is the king of vending there, but I haven't seen him.

As for the whole All Female Cheerleading Team, great job this fall. Missy told me to get you in there.

Kobo, thanks for the pizza and drinks, yo.

Phil Blair is probably the funniest person on campus. If you are ever talking to him, ask him what Peter Pan Bus drivers do with the shades in the windows. If you're lucky he might go into full detail.

The girls who have made me laugh the most this semester are Sarah, Kerry, Lara, Erin, Abby, Ellen, little Abby, and Kate. You guys are the best. Hope you are enjoying this in Greek Myth.

Melissa Shattuck gets her name in the paper all the time, but I had to sneak her in. Be real careful if you are ever walking home from Puffton with her.

I want to let Teall Gerrett know that I don't suck completely at writing. I just a suck a little.

I owe Brian Shugrue some Sams. I'm working on it.

Jessica Capano is one of the great masters of the Annual Fund. She's been a muse to many callers there. Callers such as Nicole D'Allesandro and Liad Weizman have been inspired.

To Ed, the English Grad student who corrected me on my Phish fact from September: I just wanted to say thanks for taking the time to look up my email address. I'm serious; it's the only response I've ever gotten. By the way, I am right. Phish couldn't have played at the Mullins Center in 1985 because it wasn't open yet. So ha. It just might have been the Southwest Horseshoe.

Yes, Felicity Heath, I really do write for the paper.

No, Al, I will not be a rugby groupie, and I will not write articles about rugby.

I have a six-degree theory about UMass—sort of like the "Six Degrees of Kevin Bacon." Six other people connect everyone here at the most. So chances are a lot of you recognized a name. To the people who read this, you have two instructions. The first one is if you did recognize anyone's name make sure you let him or her know. Secondly, I didn't go into a full length story about any of the above mentioned, so if you want to know the stories you'll have to ask them. Until next time, just remember that you can't please everyone. You can try, but you won't. I tried.

Skybox gets its metal on

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

Hard rock returns to the UMass campus on Saturday when the Skybox puts on its Hard and Heavy 2000 show, an all-day event showcasing the best in regional metal.

It's going to be a long and loud day in the Campus Center, as first band Reset Smith is scheduled to take the stage at 3 p.m., and last band Gangsta Bitch Barbie isn't set to begin until after the midnight hour. In the meantime, ten bands are going to show what they're made of and why the local metal scene is hot like it hasn't been in recent memory, or perhaps ever.

Gangsta Bitch Barbie are the Boston darlings of the show. Their debut album This Is Not a Test won awards and accolades nationwide, and that combined with their constant and locally legendary live shows landed the band a deal with Grand Royal Records. Their first effort for that label is due in February. GBB have been gigging nonstop in Boston and New England in general, and promise to rip the stage to pieces when they cap off the Hard and Heavy show. This is the second time GBB has played the Skybox, and their high-octane rendition of "Godzilla" was the highlight of the entire night the last time they were here; we can all only pray that we will be treated to an encore of that stellar performance.

Simpl.e, a Springfield-based nu-metal band, are immediately before GBB on the bill. Their first album on Boston-based Retaliate Records, Rise of a Fallen Empire, has created a big buzz for this Western Mass. band, and nationwide attention has been coming to them as a result. Expect an uproar when the band breaks into "Middle Skool," the successful single off that album, and beware of the pit. Simpl.e usually makes it dangerous.

Also appearing on the bill are Eastcide, a rap-metal band from the City of Champions, Brockton, Mass. After ripping up the scene around New England for years, the band finally broke nationally in the past few years, playing dates across the country with bands such as Tree, Limp Bizkit, Staind, Coal Chamber, and many more. An appearance on the popular Farmclub.com TV show further helped Eastcide gain their momentum towards rock stardom. Of all the bands appearing on Saturday, Eastcide is the one most likely to follow Staind and Godsmack to the big time. 7th Rail Crew and Diecast are both Boston bands making it huge locally and a respectable dent nationally. both have toured the country, both have received radio play, and both are making their return to the Skybox. 7th Rail's most recent CD Open Your Eyes had been featured in Newbury Comics since its release last month, and WAAF, for one, has taken to including the band in its rotation. While 7th Rail is a more tempered band, featuring a bongo player in addition to the heavy guitar, Diecast are blasting metal-tinged Boston hardcore—straight up, no excuses. Still touring on the strength of 1998's Undo the Wicked (although a new album is set to be released on Now or Never Records in January), they put on a no-frills headbanging show second to none.

Rounding out the show are C60 (formerly Cobalt 60), past winners of the WBCN Rumble and featuring a former member of Sam Black Church, Collapse Into Reason, a goth-tinged band who've played Club Metro in Northampton; Edgar, a self-described "new wave metal" band from Central Mass. whose members are all under the age of 20; and Irepress and Reset Smith, two local hard rock acts featuring members who attend our very own University of Massachusetts.

The formerly advertised tattoo/piercing/henna artists will not be at the show due to a delay in the changing of Massachusetts state law regarding tattooing, but it shouldn't really matter, since the music was the main attraction anyways.

"We're excited about so many talented emerging regional metal and hardcore acts on the same stage on the same day," said Tom Sadlowski, one of the main forces behind the Skybox. "It's gonna be an intense day."

Friends and former band mates gather to pay tribute to Santa Barbara's brightest star, the late Lynn Strait.

Strait from the heart: Tribute for Lynn

STRAIT UP
Various Artists Immortal

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Like moths drawn to a flame, friends, family, and former bandmembers of James Lynn Strait gather around a beach bonfire in the video for "Angel's Son," the single from Strait Up. The scene in the video was a theme that resonated throughout Strait's life. He, like the bonfire, attracted people to his fiery passion for living, an irresistible lust for life that inevitably affected anyone close to him.

A tribute album for the late singer from the Santa Barbara outfit Snot, Strait Up brings together the former members of Snot with the band's close friends to perform songs that would have been sung by Lynn for the second Snot album. However, fate stepped in and involved Lynn and his dog Dobbs in a fatal car accident on the way to the studio on Dec. 11, 1998.

Approaching two years since his death, Lynn and Snot's presence is still felt in the metal scene. And for good reason, as their debut Get Some was one of the most energetic and distinctive albums the '90's metal community produced. An album that in no way took itself too seriously but was never lacking conviction, it foreshadowed future bands such as Queens of the Stone Age that proved bands can be heavy and still have fun. Ozzfest 2000 saw California's shovel covering Snot's "I Jus' Lie," the latest in the Earth festival bond Lynn from Sevendust auditions honored Lynn's memory, and albums from Sevendust and Soulfly have been dedicated to the late singer.

I had the opportunity to meet Lynn with two friends before a show on his 30th and last birthday. We shook hands, he gave a hug to my friend who adorned a Snot T-shirt, and we talked about the show and his controversial appearance at the Mansfield Ozzfest. It was the kind of thing band members do for their fans that require minimal effort but mean the world to their admirers. And with Lynn it didn't seem like he was "doing" anything or making any kind of effort his personable, jovial personality dictated only one course of action: to be real and honest and likable.

It was this spirit that brought friends of the band like Sen from System of a Down and M.C.U.D. from Deftones into the studio to record Strait Up. As noted in Kerrang! magazine, the personal nature of the lyrics and the concept of a tribute album at all can seem exclusive to those unfamiliar with Lynn or Snot. However, what is here is certainly accessible to anyone interested in any of the vocalists or metal in general, and is unquestionably a must for any Snot fan.

The album is like a direct trip back to the lively new metal scene of 1998 with debut albums from Soulfly, System of a Down, and theirs p.e. fresh in everyone's mind and the 1998 Ozzfest and the subsequent solo tours establishing a real community atmosphere. Nearly all of the tracks are great, offering solid metal and essential tracks from established bands. Soulfly fans will love the characteristically primal heaviness of "Cash a Spirit," M.C.U.D.'s distinctive personality is in fact on "I Know Where You're At," and Jonathan Davis sounds as defeated as ever on "Take It Back!" Even bands with sometimes-shaky receptions in the metal scene contribute strong tracks, especially Coal Chamber's "Funeral Flight" and Mark McGrath's (of Sugar Ray) eerie "Reaching Out." Snot's excellent "Absent" is also here for anyone that missed the Stungeland soundtrack.

The weak spots on the album are negligible, but I could have done without Ted Dupst's "Forever," as well as the Get Some inedits that closes the album. "Sad Air," a spoken word track from Lynn over music, is interesting and emotional, but casual listeners just here for the music may find it useless. They also may not be able to relate fully to the often intense mourning and love for the late singer throughout the album, especially on Jason from R.K.L.'s "Until Next Time."

In the end, though, there is no question this album is for the Snot fan, and in satisfying them the album does so immensely. Like Snot, Strait Up can be contemplative, rousing, and joyful all at the same time, and for those reasons, would likely earn Strait's seal of approval. More than a great tribute, the album is a document of a special time in the metal scene, and the spirit that ran through all of the bands was certainly very much alive in Lynn and everyone around him.

DAVE MATTHEWS!...tribute band

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

With the onslaught of super fame comes the massive fury of acknowledgment. The Dave Matthews Band is one of the most popular and prominent acts in the country. Selling out stadium after stadium, Dave Matthews and crew lead a legion of ever-willing popular music fans into a league of their own blissful heaven. Aside from the intense live show that Dave Matthews constantly brings with him, there has been commercial hit after commercial hit: "Crash Into Me," "Crush," and Ants Marching," just to name a few. One of the most familiar of their radio hits epitomizes the band with the chorus, "Eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we'll die. Cuz we're trippin billies."

Apparently the phrase stuck like glue for Trippin Billies band members Bille Denny, Howard Shaw, Sean Canturna, Clyde Davis, Will Howard and Bryan James from Chicago. The six-man ensemble labeled themselves after the trademarked song and has made a living taking from Dave Matthews Band.

Saturday night at 8:30 p.m. the Pearl Street Nightclub will bring Trippin Billies to Northampton.

Trippin Billies comes fully equipped with a band director, a professional jazz drummer, a guitarist, bassist, saxophone player, and keyboardist. They are used to playing college towns because that is where a very big hulk of the Dave Matthews fan club is based. The band claims it "can present jazz, classic rock, contemporary alternative rock, and classic and contemporary R&B with authenticity and authority."

Aside from Dave Matthews band material, Trippin Billies also cover an array of different artists. In the past, they have preformed songs from Santana, Pearl Jam, the Allman Brothers and Counting Crows.

Area Dave Matthews fans show support for the tribute show. Senior Political Science major Mark Griffin said, "If you can't have Dave, you might as well have the next best thing."

Area high school student Mark Fernandes, who describes himself as a fan of Dave Matthews Band said, "I think [the idea of a Dave Matthews Cover band] is alright. There are a lot of people out there that wanna plus the music they love listening to."

Steven Lesser, a Worcester Polytech student who has seen Dave Matthews Band on several occasions said, "There are tons of Dave Matthews fans around the area and I think a lot of people would like to hear DMB music from other people." He said he thinks that a tribute band is a good idea as long as Trippin Billies does not, "try to pawn the stuff off as their own."

The Trippin Billies show will follow a set by another band, Nickelback, at Pearl Street. Pearl Street is anticipating a large crowd for the Nickelback concert, and is hoping that fans will walk downstairs to check out a second show.

Trippin Billies takes the stage at 8:30 p.m. in the clubroom of Northampton's Pearl Street Nightclub. Tickets are $8.

FAC welcomed icy Cinderella

CINDERELLA
Concert Hall
Nov. 28

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Everyone has heard the story of Cinderella, a classic fairytale that has been a popular bedtime story for decades to children all around the globe. Yet, for all of the productions of Cinderella, spanning from cartoon to live acting, none held much similarity to Cinderella on Ice. The production, presented by the Russian St. Petersburg State Ice Ballet at the Fine Arts Center, flew in the face of conventional performances of the fairy tale.

For one, the entire cast of the production spent the night on ice skates. The Concert Hall stage was transformed into an ice skating rink with a little help from IDM Ice and Leary Ice. Looking at the stage, it was impossible to see the rink, which was blocked off from vision by a piece of wood, making it look as if the skaters were moving around on wood wearing ice skates.

Another interesting aspect of the performance is that there was no speaking. The entire story of Cinderella was told through movement and dramatic motions. Although the acting often came across as overly dramatic, the aesthetic elements of the show were virtually flawless. The skaters, most of which had formal ballet training or had competed in professional skating championships, preformed routines that looked very similar to the Nutcracker—on skates.

The actors however should be given some credit; the atrocious lighting that was a consistent factor throughout the entire show seriously hindered their performance. Rather than being subtle or even remotely attractive, it simply made the show difficult to watch. The spotlight that was meant to follow the movement of the main characters on the ice was off, often shedding light onto the scenery or, even worse, the curtain. The lighting in the background was far too harsh during the more romantic scenes and overall inappropriate for portions of the show that were meant to be surreal or mystical.

Perhaps the best elements of the show were the other more literal and tangible aspects of the performance. The music from Sergei Prokofiev was one of the better portions of the production. It was subtle enough so that it did not overpower the show, while at the same time providing excellent background music and advancing the plot through actor movement. Costumes and scenery were also well done by the group.

COURTESY OF THE PETERSBURG STATE ICE BALLET

Cinderella takes to the ice courtesy of the St. Petersburg State Ice Ballet.

The scenery had a hand-painted theme to it, with almost a three-dimensional look to it that gave the audience the impression of actually being in both a castle and a house. The costumes were also effective for the production, with Anna Mumrina, the wardrobe master using color contrast as a way of demonstrating both the heroes and villains of the show. While Cinderella and the Prince were often clad in either white or blue, the wicked stepsisters traditionally wore florescent colors. This helped to explain portions of the show that were unclear, due, for the most part, because of the lack of dialogue.

Overall the show was not bad, owing most of its success to the visual aspects of the show rather than either content or acting.

Will the West be won?

The Oregon Trail: tough road to take; Rose Garden: tough place to play

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

The Rose Garden in Portland, scientifically engineered to be a tough place to play.

When the Massachusetts men's basketball team ventures into the 19,980-seat facility tomorrow night, it will have to contend with more than just an undefeated Oregon Duck squad. The Minutemen will have to overcome a technological terror known as the "Acoustical Cloud."

The Cloud is a mass of 160 panels, each 10 feet square, suspended above the event floor. Each panel has a hard and soft side, and the hard sides are aimed at the floor during athletic events to amplify both the on-court action and the crowd noise.

UMass (1-2) needs to make a little noise of its own after dropping two straight winnable games on the road. The Maroon and White leaped out of the gates with an opening win over Iona at the William D. Mullins Center, but has since fallen to Marquette in Wisconsin and Holy Cross at the Worcester Centrum.

Expectations for this year's team ran somewhat high during the preseason, as Head Coach James "Bruiser" Flint had imported some much-needed size to revamp the team's front line. Flint brought absurd junior forward Jackie Rogers, who together with now eligible big man Eric Williams formed a paint nucleus that would seemingly put an end to UMass' rebounding woes.

But revamped rule changes have resulted in a marked increase in personal fouls called on the team's big men, all but negating the Maroon and White's size upgrade. Center Kitwana Rhymer has been limited to 43 total minutes of regular-season action thus far, and opponents have attempted a staggering 111 free throws over the course of UMass' last three games.

The carom situation hasn't improved either, opponents have racked up an average 12-board edge (41.7-29.7) over the Minutemen this season.

The Ducks (4-0) have spent the start of the 2000 slate on the opposite end of the roundball spectrum. Coach Ernie Kent's troops have torched the twine to an average tune of 83.5 points per game, and boast three top-tier scoring threats in Bryan Bracey (15.8 ppg, 7.8 rpg), Frederick Jones (15.3 ppg, 6.3 rpg) and Anthony Norwood (14.3 ppg).

The Ducks are no strangers to hardwood glory, having made their first NCAA Tournament trip in five years last season after posting a 22-8 record. Oregon has reached the postseason four times in the last six years, twice since Kent took the reins in 1997.

"Everything we do is to prepare our team to get into postseason play," Kent said. "That goal hasn't changed from last year, it's just a different challenge – a steeper challenge, a more creative challenge, a more demanding challenge, but the same goal."

Tip-off is slated for 8:30 p.m. Pacific time.

Looking up: there hasn't been a lot of it so far this season for the Minutemen. Willie Jenkins (4) and Eric Williams (21) will have to be at their best for UMass to have any chance against Oregon on Saturday.

Women send tremors through Cali

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

They've gone West, with one thing on the agenda—two wins.

California is a vacation site for most people from the East coast, but this weekend the University of Massachusetts is sending its women's basketball team on a whirlwind of competition, with games against the University of San Francisco and Stanford University.

UMass plays its first game of the weekend and second game on the road tonight in the War Memorial Gym in San Francisco. The 2-1 Lady Dons are looking to redeem themselves after No. 17 Stanford mauled them by 26 points. A win over UMass would help the Bay Bridge fans forget about the Stanford massacre, and put the Lady Dons back on the winning track.

Center Kim Whisler leads the frontcourt attack while point guard Melanie Turner is the threat from the outside. Whisler brought home 16 points and five boards against Stanford while Turner shot four-for-seven from behind the three point line to finish with 19 points over 36 minutes.

"They score a lot of points," said UMass Head Coach Joanie O'Brien. "They have a couple big kids, but most of what they do is with guard penetration. They got a lot of their kids back, and they have a couple big kids who are really good."

On Sunday afternoon, the Minutewomen will find themselves pitted against their second top-25 opponent of the season, No. 17 Stanford. The 4-1 Cardinal squad demolished the Lady Dons, 92-66. Six players reached double figures in points throughout the rout, with 17 of those 92 coming from junior forward Enjoli Izidor.

"They've lost their backcourt, so they're starting two freshman in the starting lineup," O'Brien said.

"They're big, they have a couple kids who are really athletic, and they have two kids who really shoot the three very well.

I think we'll feel comfortable going into the game. It's just a matter of if we can handle them on their home court. I'm sure they're going to come after us with the huge revenge factor."

Last year, the Minutewomen notched their second win of the season against Stanford, 74-69. Senior point guard Kathy Coyner led all Minutewomen in points, putting up 20, while the ever-reliable Jen Butler brought home 11 boards.

"I definitely think we can win," Coyner said. "I think we match up very well with them. Going with the fact that we did beat them last year, we have the confidence. But yet we understand they do have the revenge factor against us. I look forward to it."

San Francisco is averaging a whopping 89 points per game and the Cards have averaged over 82 points per contest. A strong defensive effort will be the key for victory throughout the weekend for the Minutewomen.

"Both teams score in the 80's, so we really have to concentrate on our defense," Coyner said. "Hopefully we can buckle down and play well."

The Sunday game will be the highlight of the California trip for the Minutewomen. It's the first televised game for UMass this season, and although the Maples Pavilion is traditionally a non-welcoming arena, UMass has the opportunity to prove to the Nation that they are one of the top programs in the country.

"It's going to be jacked up; it's a Sunday afternoon TV game and it's going to be a lot of fun. I'll look forward to see how we handle such a tough environment."

Struggling UMass looks to top BU

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

During the course of a season, any team will surely endure a losing streak. Some spirals may be longer than others, but the key to a successful team is a club that can stop a skid dead in its tracks before anything major becomes of it.

Losing is not something that the Boston University hockey program has been accustomed during the Jack Parker era. In fact, the Terriers have been a fixture among the nation's elite programs and have won two NCAA titles during Parker's 26 seasons behind the bench.

Needless to say, the first 11 games of the 2000-01 season have been somewhat of a horror show for Parker's team. The squad that was tabbed to finish second in the Hockey East standings currently resides in eighth place in the league and has lost six straight games to fall to 2-8-1.

Yet even though BU has stumbled out of the blocks, it can make up some ground in the conference standings this weekend against one of the teams that it is looking up at UMass. The Minutemen sit all alone in fourth place and can make a statement this weekend with a solid showing against the Terriers.

That task will be a formidable one, though, as UMass has posted a 0-5-1 mark in its last six games. In addition, the Minutemen have only defeated BU once since the program was revived for the 1993-94 season. The Minutemen have also never won a game at Walter Brown Arena in Boston.

"They [the pair of games] are huge," said UMass hockey coach Don Cahoon, who won two national championships during his playing days at BU. "I can't remember that last time that a BU hockey team lost six games in a row."

UMass (3-8-2, 3-1 in Hockey East) is coming off a 3-1 loss to No. 10 St. Cloud State on Saturday night at the William D. Mullins Center. The Minutemen will get a chance to redeem themselves in front of the home faithful tonight at 7 p.m. Tomorrow night the scene shifts to Beantown for a start at the same time.

"We've given a couple of games away," Cahoon said. "Part of that is our mindset. These kids don't realize that in close games, if you win the third period, you win the game. They sit there with their past experiences and are waiting for something bad to happen. To overcome that mindset over time demands that we make some changes."

Goal scoring has been a problem for both teams during their recent skids. BU has managed only 12 goals over its six losses, while UMass has recorded only 11 markers during its winless run.

Offensively, the Minutemen will look for offensive production out of sophomore forward Tim Turner (13 points), senior captain Jeff Turner (12 points) and junior winger Martin Miljko (11 points).

BU will rely on forwards Dan Cavanaugh and Carl Corazzini (10 points each) to pace its offensive attack.

Nevertheless, this weekend's series is a crucial one for both teams and the couplet should prove to be action-packed.

"I talked with Jack today [Wednesday], and he said that since they've lost six in a row, he would take a split right now," Cahoon said. "But I'm not willing that give one away. We need to take care of business of Friday, and then try to steal one on Saturday. It should be an exciting series for us."

UMass Opens season

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will be bouncing back into action on Saturday night at 7 p.m. when it hosts the Massachusetts Open at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Two new recruits have joined the Minutemen in their quest for dominance over the Eastern Collegian Athletic Conference (ECAC). Freshmen Patrick McFarlin of Longmeadow and Darren Morace of Westfield are predicted to bring power to the team. Both frosh are ranked in the top ten of the country's junior gymnasts. McFarlin placed sixth in the 2000 Junior National Championships, while Morace pulled a fourth place finish in the 1998 competition.

Andy Leis, team captain and veteran to the team, should be another great one to watch this winter. Leis, who possesses power in every event, holds the UMass record on pommel horse and ranks in the top ten in all-around and horizontal bar.

The force behind men's gymnastics, Head Coach Roy Johnson, stresses high achievement to his team while running an intense program.

"This is the first time we have two all-rounders coming into our program together that are both ranked in the top 10 in the nation. So we should be in great shape next season," Johnson said.

With talent, knowledge, and strength – this season should start off with a bang. The team has been practicing since the start of school, and just recently had its intersquad competition.

"We've been working really hard," sophomore gymnast Justin Hammal said. "Hopefully we'll do really well."

Featured schools competing against UMass will be Temple, Army, Navy, University of Vermont, and MIT.

Shepard to lecture on hate crimes

Judy Shepard, mother of hate crime victim Matthew Shepard will speak today at the Fine Arts Center.

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

In an effort to promote campus-wide hate crime awareness, Judy Shepard, the mother of Matthew Shepard, will be speaking at the Fine Arts Center today.

Her talk entitled "The Legacy of Matthew Shepard" a presentation by Judy Shepard" will be held at 8 p.m. and is free to University of Massachusetts students and to the five-college community. It is co-sponsored by the Stonewall Center and the Distinguished Visitors Program.

"The Distinguished Visitors Program is the only campus organization charged with bringing lecturers to the UMass community. This semester we decided to work with the Stonewall Center to bring Judy Shepard to campus," said John Kazlauskas, a spokesperson for the DVP. "The event will focus primarily on how to make schools and communities safer – not only for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender students, but also for those of different racial, class, ethnic, gender and religious backgrounds."

Matthew Shepard, a 21-year-old openly homosexual student at the University of Wyoming, was beaten to death in a homophobic crime. Shepard was lured away from a bar and robbed of $20 by Russell Henderson and Aaron McKinney he was then tied to a fence, bludgeoned with a pistol and left to die. Three days following the event he did die of brain damage in a hospital in Wyoming. The crime was related to his sexual orientation and was called a hate crime. Both Henderson and McKinney are now in jail for the crime.

"DVP felt that Ms. Shepard would be a powerful nationally recognized figure to reiterate how far we as a society still need to go to address these issues," he said. "She can speak firsthand of the pain of losing her son to antigay hate, the need for strong hate crimes legislation, and the dangers of complacency."

Stephen Pereira, the associate director of the Stonewall Center explained that Shepard, through the explanation of both hate crimes and her son's death, strove to inform students that hate crimes occurred often and the results of them.

"She is speaking about the importance of hate crime awareness legislation," he explained. "These crimes are so brutal and they are happening due

Five students injured after drunk driving accident on Friday night

Five female students from the University of Massachusetts were involved in a drunk driving accident on Friday night that left one student in critical condition at Baystate Medical Center.

The students, who were all members of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority, were involved in the accident, which was reported at 2:26 a.m. on Triangle Street north of the East Pleasant Street intersection. The Amherst Police and Fire Departments arrived on the scene to find a 1996 Isuzu Rodeo on its side in the middle of the road, with heavy damages to it. Police believe that the car hit an embankment and then struck a tree before overturning in the road.

Extracted from the car by the Jaws of Life, 21-year-old Mary Cannon of Woburn was treated at the scene and sent by ambulance to the north fire station.

Upon Cannon's arrival, a Life Flight helicopter transported her to Baystate. She was last listed in critical condition in the intensive care unit of the hospital.

Also involved in the accident was 20-year-old Holly Spaulding. She was rushed by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where she was treated and released. The driver of the vehicle, 20-year-old Amie Guerra was arrested and charged with driving under the influence of alcohol.

All of these women are members of Kappa Kappa Gamma located on Nutting Street in Amherst.

Questions have arisen over how the chapter will deal with the incident.

The Amherst chapter could possibly face sanctions from Kappa's national headquarters, which may include revoking its charter.

Greek Affairs was unavailable for comment at press time.

Kappa Kappa Gamma refused to comment on the situation.

7th Annual Fundraiser does great for AIDS care fight

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

AIDS CARE/Hampshire County raised an estimated $10,000 yesterday during its 7th Annual Chocolate Dessert Buffet and Silent Auction fundraiser, held from 2-5 p.m. at the Northampton Center for the Arts.

As the doors opened, supporters of all ages streamed into the room to find platters of fudge, candies, fruit, cookies, cakes, donuts and ice cream dishes all for the tasting and tables of artwork, stuffed animals, books, lamps and other collectables up for bid.

All those involved in organizing the event considered it a tremendous success that was both enjoyable and beneficial in the fight against AIDS.

"The event turned out to be fabulous. We had 70 items in the auction and 45 different dessert platters all generously donated by various business of Hampshire County," Program Director Anna-Beth Winograd explained.

According to Winograd, the fundraiser first began seven years ago with a small group of volunteers who decided to host a fundraiser for AIDS CARE by inviting people to indulge themselves in sampling as many chocolate desserts as they wish after making a small donation to the organization.

She pointed out that four years ago, the silent auction was added to the fundraiser, making it the biggest event AIDS CARE hosts all year, requiring the most planning and raising the most money.

Volunteer Coordinator Court Cline commented, "The money we raise will be used to support our services, which are free to anyone in Hampshire County who has been diagnosed HIV-positive."

He explained how the organization hosts support groups, acupuncture and massage sessions, as well as providing assistance in over-the-counter medications, fitness/health memberships, a Buddy Volunteer program, Child Care and Housing assistance, transportation, emergency food vouchers, financial counseling and congregate meals.

"We get some of our funding for these programs from the government under the Ryan White Care Act, but that money doesn't cover all of our services. That's why we host fundraising events like this," Court said.

AIDS CARE also handed out printed material to raise AIDS awareness during the fundraiser. The information included facts such as, "It is estimated that 1 out of every 154 Massachusetts residents live with HIV," and "As of September 1, 1999, the number of reported cases of AIDS in Massachusetts has risen to 14,783."

Volunteers, such as James Rieley, gave out red AIDS ribbons to guests. As a client who has received AIDS CARE services for the past 6 years, Rieley explained how volunteering his time is one way he can give back to the organization.

Gary Maynard's Jazz Quartet provided the fundraiser's musical entertainment free of charge.

Maynard, the group's trumpet player, remarked, "This is the fifth year that we have volunteered to play at

Following nearly two days of partisan legal battle, attorneys for both Al Gore and George W. Bush gave their closing statements yesterday on the vice-president's demands for a hand recount in both the Miami-Dade and Palm Beach counties.

After ten hours of arguing as to whether or not expert witnesses should be called in regarding ballot boxes, and voting machines, lawyers for both sides finally rested their cases at 7 p.m. in the Leon County District Court in Tallahassee.

The case is left solely up to Judge N. Sanders Saul, who promised to render a decision about the election in a swift manner. Democratic lawyers mentioned that they feared that the judge would rule against them, at which point they would appeal the decision to the state Supreme Court. The judge must render a decision by Dec. 12, the federal deadline for states to name electors.

Throughout this controversy are claims that Gore should have conceded the election long ago. Dick Cheney, vice presidential nominee for the Republican Party appeared on NBC yesterday stressing the need for Gore to put an end to the election.

"I do think that it's time for him to concede," he told NBC. "So far, he's chosen not to do that- to pursue other avenues- and clearly that's his perogative. But I think... history would regard him in a better light if he were to bring this to a close."

Although Democrats explained that if Gore were to concede, he would do so in a gracious manner. He does not have any current plans to do so however.

"I can assure you that the vice president, when the time comes, will concede in a very gracious way," Gore lieutenant Warren Christopher said. "He understands his obligations to the people of the country."

Dick Gephardt, the Democratic leader in the House of Representatives expressed the importance of making sure that the election and the Florida recount were done in a fair way.

"Would you want to wake up a month from now and have the national popular winner and the actual winner in Florida not be the president of the United States," he asked on Meet the Press.

Gore also made comments about the potential of conceding the election, explaining that he would recognize Bush as president if he were sworn in.

"At the end of the day, when all processes have taken place, if George Bush is sworn in as president he'll be my president," Gore said in the interview. "He'll be America's president."

Following the talk there will be a book-signing at Forbush Hall in the Campus Center room 168A on December 8 at 7 p.m. that is being held by the Distinguished Visitors Program. The campus community is invited to give suggestions as to what can be done to prevent hate crimes both on campus and in the community at large. The event will feature a panel of guests that include Women's Studies professors, representatives from the UMass Police Department, and representatives from both the Dean of Students Office and other campus agencies.

"Hate crimes and safety on campuses is not a 'gay issue,' as some contend, but rather a community one," Kazlauskas said. "In fact, these are societal problems that will not be solved unless people work across lines of race, sex, religion, ability, class, and sexual orientation."

U. Maryland likes its WB

By Leslie Flint
The Diamondback (U. Maryland)

(U-WIRE) COLLEGE PARK, MD – The phones stop ringing, the textbooks close and the away messages are put up on AOL Instant Messenger. No, it's not nap time, or even dinner time, but rather "Dawson's Time," a weekly hour break that causes college students to scramble up to find the coziest spot in front of the TV and emerge themselves into the romance and drama of adolescent love.

"Dawson's Time," Is not merely a sickness shared by a few students; it is a symptom of a much larger disease: A WB obsession.

Many University of Maryland students said that while they do not watch a lot of TV, they follow at least one show on the Warner Bros. network.

Sophomore communication major Lauren Tafflin watches Dawson's Creek every week with her roommate. Tafflin, who likes to analyze the show, gets annoyed when her roommate talks during the good parts.

"Sometimes she will start talking on the phone right during one of the feeling moments," Tafflin said. "You know, during one of those moments'."

Dawson's Creek is just one of the many shows airing on the WB. Other shows popular among students include Felicity, Popular, 7th Heaven, Roswell, Buffy the Vampire Slayer and Angel.

Sophomore elementary education major Kim Towner said no matter how much work she and her roommate have, they always find time for their favorite WB shows.

"We call Wednesdays 'no work Wednesdays' because all we do is watch Dawson's and Felicity," she said.

Sophomore neurobiology and physiology major Kieran Coughlin has been watching Dawson's Creek since its premiere in 1998. She said when she was in high school she used to get together with her friends and have "Dawson's" parties.

"We all went to someone's house and ate and talked," Coughlin said. "It was the typical slumber party atmosphere." Now that she's in college, Coughlin gets together with the girls on her floor in LaPlata Hall every week to watch the show.

Freshman letters and sciences major Beth Hafer said she watches Dawson's Creek because the "plot is more interesting." Her friend, listening to the conversation, raised her eyebrows and looked dubious at Hafer's use of the word "plot."

While the WB network has a host of shows aimed at a young audience, many students realize the shows offer more escapism than reality.

Freshman letters and sciences major Lindsey Urbaniak said she enjoys watching the show, but she questions how accurate it is.

"I don't think it's realistic, it's just fun to watch. No one's really like that," she said.

Several students said the vocabulary of the characters is much more advanced than that of typical teenagers. Freshman chemical engineering major Zach Tillman said that turns him off to the shows.

"I would watch it because it has an interesting story line, but the dialogue is a little too over the edge for me," he said.

Realism aside, many students expressed appreciation for the network's offering of programs about people their age.

Computers: Essential or optional?

Do the computers make the school?

It was reported in the Boston Globe today that the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill has become the first major public university in the nation to require that all students possess laptops. The article also said that Massachusetts is considering applying a similar rule to its schools, requiring all state school students (not just those from UMass) to have a laptop as part of their education.

This is a very hasty step that Massachusetts educational officials need to think very hard about before they make any definite decision.

In the first place, laptops are not inexpensive. For college students, many of whom are already strapped for cash with the fees that currently exist, requiring this additional expense would be a burden that cannot be ignored. While the Globe piece does say that financial aid would be available for those who qualify under the considered plan, it does not say whether this aid would be loans or grants or a mix of both. It can be assumed that anyone who does qualify for aid for a laptop has already taken out aid in order to pay for the traditional education (tuition, room and board, etc.) and any more loans could prove as an extra crippling effect later in life.

Also, it must be stated the requiring computers for all students does put a greater emphasis on those majors for whom a computer is a more obvious tool. Computer science, engineering, physics – these are the majors for whom computers are a great priority. I cannot help but notice that a copy of "The Elements of Style," a tool mandatory for English, journalism, and comparative literature majors, is not being made mandatory. The ability to write is just as great a need in the real world as is computer skills. The bias against the liberal arts at this University is great enough – do we need to subject their students to an unnecessary burden?

On the other hand, it is beyond debate that computer skills are a very, very valuable asset to have in the modern job economy. Students will benefit from a basic (or, of course, advanced) knowledge of the inner workings of the machines when they do finally graduate and go to make their way in the world.

Of course, this is why the University has a computer science program and publicly available computer labs. Those interested in computers always have the opportunity to learn more. Is this a case where the University has to force its students to learn, to make sure it looks out for their best interest where they may not actually care to do it for themselves?

The Daily Collegian cannot yet take a position on this issue until more concrete facts are made clear, but at the moment we feel that the University and the state educational officials in general have a lot of work to do before their plan can be felt to be actually worth implementing at the University of Massachusetts. The potential negatives of such a plan are of a greatness that they definitely need to be addressed before any forward progress can be made.

The Unsolved Mysteries of UMass

In my four years at this institution, there are several things I have been unable to comprehend. In the coming lines, I would like to share these enigmas and get some answers to the questions that have been piling up during my education.

The Library Elevators: When you press for the descending elevator on the higher floors of the library, why does the elevator occasionally breeze past? This is extremely annoying, there are times when a person wants to go home. One of those times is after studying a subject that a person should never be forced to comprehend, such as electromagnetism. Why, about every other week, is one of the five elevators out of service? It would seem that at a university with a population just under 30,000 that we should have working elevators. Elevators are important to this campus, because as we all know, no one uses the stairs. There is nothing worse than racing to catch the elevator in the lobby so you can head up to the 16th floor and some lazy student has pushed the 2nd floor button. Why would you do this, it is only one floor from the entrance, are you that tired? The only idea I've ever had about this is that people are not familiar with the staircases. I assure you that they are located on each floor and are never out of service.

Southwest Female Dress code: Why is it that the women of Southwest all have the same basic wardrobe for the weekends. It is a versatile style because it can be wore in the warmth of spring through to the chill of winter, apparently. Every person reading this has seen the Southwest black spandex pants and the accompanying 6-inch platform shoes, with the optional tight T-shirt. Why do women go out knowing that every other girl at The Monkey Bar is going to be wearing the same thing? My theory on the garb of Southwest is that there was a bright man who realized how much money college women spend on clothing. This man (who is now very rich) sent his daughter to UMass, knowing the highest population and greatest exposure for his line of clothing was in Southwest so he had his daughter reside there. Once the gentlemen who frequent Amherst on Fridays and Saturday night saw the new look, they all flocked to her. She stood out because this was probably during the late 80's and most of the women at UMass during this time period looked like a member of the Gogo's. Now a thought dawned on the collective consciousness of all women who were there that fateful night, " I can dress like that, and I can score with drunk frat guys just as easily as her, what does she have that I don't have." After the girls discovered that the pants came from a store in the mall, they all flocked there and the wise father's plan would make him a sizeable fortune. As you read these lines, ask yourself, "Do I have a pair of Southwest pants in my closet?" Try something different next Saturday. Perhaps you can start the next fashion trend.

The Staff at the People's Market: Why is it that the wonderful folk at The People's Market always are in such a great mood? It makes no difference if it is the middle of finals; venture into this market in The Student Union and a smile is always assured. Do these people not experience stress? If this is the case I'll take an application, hell I'll pay to work there? There is one woman at The People's Market that is my ray of sunshine, each time I buy my morning green apple, she greets me with a wide smile and tells me to have a great day, why are these people so joyous. Is there a pep talk before each shift, are they making 30 dollars an hour or is it what I suspect, there is something in the Save the Rainforest granola? With prices on this campus sky rocketing, it is nice to have a place where the faces and prices are friendly. I don't care what you do with granola.

This comical approach to the wonders of Umass is no way an opus but to be honest, right before finals, I'm slightly tired of people with a message. Occasionally I want to have a laugh and the goal was to have fun with my readers one last time. I am graduating and will have to come up with something meaningful for my last column so I hope you laughed. I hope you have been laughing along with me during my tenure, because no matter what I write, regardless of whom I criticize, I am thankful for the spaces I have had in this paper. I enjoy seeing someone who feels a connection to something I wrote. Good luck, studying, I hope this has been relaxing and humorous for you.

A new twist to Much Ado

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING

There's nothing new under the sun. So why not take something really old and reinvent it like the UMass Theatre Guild did this weekend with their production of Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing? Sort of.

Much Ado is formulaic Shakespeare comedy. On leave from some unnamed war, Don Pedro and his friends arrive in Messina. Soldiers Claudio and Benedick find love, however obliquely, with Hero and Beatrice, respectively. A happy ending is nearly thwarted by Don Pedro's bitter younger brother Don John. But the most dull-witted characters save the day and the curtain closes on a blissful note.

Of course the plot is much more dynamic than this and within its progression are all kinds of meaningful observations on power, society, revenge, and sex—to name a few. But the real crux of Much Ado is its commentary on love, seen most substantially in the thoughts and actions of Benedick and Beatrice. Thankfully Meaghan O'Keefe as Beatrice and Jonathan Smithson as Benedick headed the cast with precisely the balance of intellect and emotion needed to illustrate the complexity of Shakespeare's play. Their handle on the language was paramount and their energy never faltered.

Edward Weymouth as Don Pedro and Patrick Mularski as Leonato deserve applause for refreshingly natural performances throughout the play.

Ed Ahern as Balthasar and Jennifer Iabaili as Margaret, with less stage time, managed to make all of their lines memorable. Jay Rodger as Claudio and Sean Kelly as Don John, though not as consistently, exhibited skill as well.

But beyond these performances, the Guild's production was little more than three and a half-hours of nothing special.

Director Kristi Gillmore wrote in her program notes, "This play is being staged realistically with a strong absurdist theme underlying the action." Notwithstanding the varied definitions one can provide for both "realistic" and "absurdist," Gillmore's statement seemed more like a disclaimer than guidance.

Largely the play was performed traditionally, with no elaborate concept applied to modernize the entire story (i.e. the most recent film version of Hamlet starring Ethan Hawke.) Instead, costumes by Kelly Ristaino signified some classic setting with men in tights and women in pretty dresses.

This is all well and good, except for the few moments of the play interrupted by contemporary music to help illustrate action. For example, Marvin Gaye's "Let's Get It On" blasted during the scene where Borachio beds Hero's gentlewoman Margaret as part of a Don John's deception. It's funny, sure. It drives the point home, sure. But as an isolated contemporary sound byte? No, it doesn't work.

On the same note, Gillmore's unfortunate effort to exhaust the comedy of the Watchmen, Dogberry, and Verges was even worse. Using a sample from the Mission Impossible theme song, for instance, to create a scene featuring the Watchmen in some kind of confusing pantomime/dance routine might have been an innovative vision, but in light of an otherwise "realistic" interpretation, these mere moments of "absurdist themes" were entirely ridiculous.

Developing a concept with continuity is the real issue here and Gillmore failed to do it. An absurdist interpretation underlying a realistic one is a contradiction. Clearly the moments of so-called absurdism were inserted for humor's sake and instead of resulting in riotous laughter from the crowd, the upstaging and auxiliary dance numbers left the audience wondering what and why was going on.

In part because of the undesirable performance space that is the Student Union Ballroom, Jim Dinan's set design didn't accommodate Gillmore's direction in too many scenes. Often it was hard for half of the audience to see what was happening or the stage was overcrowded, hiding many of the cast members' faces. Compensating at least a little for these artistic shortcomings, though, was Matthew Cavanaugh's fantastic lighting design.

Gillmore and the entire cast of Much Ado About Nothing deserve applause for trying to tackle a rich text, an obsolete language, and a widely interpretive story. A more unified concept would have benefited the production, as well as attention paid to detail instead of funny accents and slapstick humor that seemed out of place in a play already packed with wit. Still, it was obvious that the Guild put a lot of work into Much Ado and for that they should be proud.

University dancers tackle ballet

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

My former dance teacher used to always tell her students that the way to run a good show was to save the best performance for last. From the performances given by the University Dancers at Bowker Auditorium on Friday night, it seems that they also adhere to that theory.

The show, which consisted of seven vignettes, spanned to include elements of both modern dance and ballet. The performance put emphasis mostly upon the dance element of the production with a more minimalist look to both the scenery and the lighting. Behind the dancers stood only a large screen that changed colors according to the theme of the number. Costumes in nearly all of the numbers were for the most part simplistic, and worked well with the general themes of the show.

The show opened slowly with a ballet number entitled "Festival," which was choreographed by Kenneth Espitz. The number, although a classic example of traditional ballet, also had its flaws. Both the choreography and the costumes reflected the mood of the piece to near perfection but the dancers themselves were unable to perform the piece to its potential. The performers during much of the number had the look of being out of time with each other. Dancers that were set into pairs intended to mirror each other, managed to execute beautiful moves, but at totally different times. Leaps were executed several seconds apart, and what was meant to be a beautiful number turned into a distracting and visually annoying portion of the show. A viewer got the impression that the dancers were not watching each other and not really working together.

Following every number, the curtain would close and the lights would come up for about three minutes. By doing this throughout the show, it made the entire production similar to watching seven different shows without moving from the auditorium. This worked as both a positive and negative element to the production, although the audience could tell that there was a significant difference between each dance, it was difficult to develop any sense of consistency.

The next two dances entitled "For Seven" and "web" were both more interesting and more creative. Both included dancers performing barefoot with a sense of both style and grace.

Following those were two numbers by choreographer Billbob Brown. The first, a number that used little pieces of song clips to contrast the difference between warm and cold. The number, beyond being excellent aesthetically, was also clever and well acted out by the performers. The next dance number by the same choreographer was entitled "Bosnia," and consisted of music provided by the UMass Percussion Ensemble. Dancers performed well to the music selection and the number was overall enjoyable.

The show closed with two of the best routines of the night, "On the Impulse" and "Ame." The first number called for the dancers to perform based upon a word offered up by the audience that they drew from a hat. The number was set to music by either John or Miro Sprague and featured the dancers using their impulses to guide them through the number. The performance was excellent, featuring a great deal of creativity and both individual and group work. The final number gave the audience the impression of being in a jungle. Dancers had on leopard print costumes and moved to music such as "Ritual Beating System" by Bahia Black and "Ame" by Anjulique Kidjo, that allowed them the freedom of movement in interesting ways.

Overall the show was excellent in spite of a few flaws with the dancers presenting a variety of different styles of movement in creative and interesting ways.

Simon introduces new material Sadly, fans stuck in Graceland

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

There is no doubt that Paul Simon is a cultural icon. However, his relationship with his fans today is based almost entirely on work he created at least ten years ago.

His Broadway production, Capeman, despite some excellent music, was an abject failure. His most recent album, You're the One, was critically skewered for not being as far-reaching as perhaps the single greatest album of all time, Graceland, and his less mentioned but equally impressive Rhythm of the Saints.

His show last Friday night at the Orpheum made it painfully obvious that for Simon, his recent work just hasn't translated to his core fan base. He just hasn't found his old licks and grooves, the kinds he needs to touch people in the same way that he had so consistently done before. He appeared, in his hat and red shirt, to be a performer bound to play his older work forever.

An audience of baby boomers with fully developed gray hair mixed with dancing hippies filled the Orpheum's seats and despite the intense difference between the two groups, they could have probably come together to agree on one thing: they wanted vintage Paul Simon. They wanted the music he performed before a half million people in Central Park, they wanted the music he played during his formative yet lonely solo years and they wanted the music that won him awards and international acclaim. They wanted his sparse solo work and his multi-layered African work. And that was it. Anything they didn't recognize however, anything that isn't part of the well-known Simon library they weren't prepared to embrace.

As such, the best performance of the night, "Darling Lorraine," a song from his new album about the trials and tribulations of a couple and the death of the wife, seemed to fall of deaf ears, or perhaps more troubling, ears waiting for "You Can Call Me Al." Ironically, Lorraine's chorus tells a story that perhaps Simon didn't mean to.

"What, you don't love me anymore?/What, you're walking out the door?/What, you don't like the way I chew?/Hey, let me tell you,/you're not, the woman that I wed/you say you're depressed but you're not, you just like to stay in bed..." Lyrically, Simon's running down the fight between Frank and Lorraine, but on another level, he seems to be admonishing his audience for refusing to come with him to Capeman and on You're the One. Like an old couple, he seemed angry, a group that he is metaphorically married to, wanted only the older Simon work, not the literally older Simon.

During his performance of new tracks, people sat calmly or had the audacity to talk in the back of the Orpheum, creating a din like some sort of fraternity party. In the corner, they gathered around the keg, talking and yelling while on the stage, just another singer performed. Except Simon isn't just another singer; he is one of America's most beloved artists, perhaps its most respected.

The crowd double bound him, barely tolerating his newer work, including songs from Saints, and Simon didn't even touch Capeman. But when he played the music that originally earned him the love of the American listening audience, the crowd snapped out of their casual listener role to become enraptured followers.

They chanted the lyrics of his songs, they stood and danced (violating the Orpheum's ridiculous no standing policy), they cheered like crazy when the heard "Graceland," "Boy in the Bubble," "Me and Julio Down by the Schoolyard," "You Can Call Me Al," and "That Was Your Mother." With those songs, Simon owned the crowd.

But in owning them, he made sure that he didn't modify his work in any sort of substantive "live" way, with the exception of two percussion solos performed by the four different percussionists on stage with him. Lacking Ladysmith Black Mambazo for his Graceland work, Simon's impressive live band was forced to not only maintain his musical stylings, which they did brilliantly, but almost to compensate vocally, a task at which they proved only acceptable at.

There's absolutely no replacing Ladysmith for the Graceland tracks. It was that South African vocal group that provided the true soul of his Album of the Year and their absence on stage (although it should be noted that there was no way this was actually going to happen) took something away from those songs. But all of his songs lacked that Ladysmith soul, like Simon was simply going through the motions in performing them.

But for Simon himself, this tour must be one of his most bittersweet. He can perform the same songs he's always performed and the crowd will cheer him endlessly, but he can't bring them to his newer work. Perhaps it was the quality of his older work that brought this upon himself, but he was performing before a crowd that just wasn't being fair, refusing to participate in his newer work.

Paul Simon is a great artist, and his show was energetic and lively. He performed all of the old classics well enough, but he's stuck in some sort of evolutionary limbo, unable to change without losing the interest of his audience and his fans.

There will be a mandatory meeting for all Arts & Ling staff & writers tommorrow night @ 8pm in the Collegian office

Shannon Crooks and the Massachusetts men's basketball team dropped its third straight game when it fell to Oregon at the Rose Garden in Portland, OR Saturday night. Read tomorrow's Sports section for the story.

UMass Opens with victory

Minutemen start season right where they left off

By Thomas MacAlpine
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team opened the 2000-01 campaign right where they had left off last year.

With the loss of All-American Jeff LaValle to graduation, the team is now led by tri-captains Jonathan Hershey, Andrew Leis and Matt Plumser. Despite the loss, first place remains a familiar place for the trio.

Last season the Minutemen earned a spot in the NCAA's after they captured their second consecutive Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) championship.

Saturday night at the Curry Hicks Cage, the Maroon and White garnered their first win of the season when it took the title in the UMass Open.

With a bye in the first rotation, Patrick McFarlin, John Szymczyk, Plumser and Leis opened the meet in the second with a valiant effort on the floor exercises. The crowd went wild after Plumser's performance scoring 7.5 and 7.4. Szymczyk followed with a strong routine, pulling him to an 8.6 and 8.4.

Another bye in the third rotation gave the Minutemen a break, but they came back strong by the fourth. Junior Darren Morace started the team on the pommel horse with a fault. Morace's second try had a better outcome, scoring an 8.0 and 7.9. Brett Nelligan and Orrin Donley both supported the team with their veteran skills.

Throughout the night, UMass dominated all of the competition, reaching the 100-point mark by their third event.

The rings gave the Maroon and White another chance to raise the bar above the competition. Once again Leis-Szymczyk and Plumser were the strong forces behind the competition, all with scores above 8.2.

After the ninth rotation, the Minutemen racked up the scores on the parallel bars. Justin Hammar and Hershey both worked hard to support the team with an average score of 7.8.

UMass ended the meet on the high bar. Senior Michael Alexander and sophomore Ben Iacobs both performed exceptionally well to bring home the first place trophy.

The Maroon and White finished with a score of 202.9 followed by Temple finishing second at 197.45. Army finished in third on the night with 192.23.

"If we put things together, things should be alright," said Leis. "Yesterday [Saturday] was basic routines, but I feel the team will be strong."

A great contributor in the victory was McFarlin. The freshman recruit out of Longmeadow was strong all around on the floor exercise, pummel horse, parallel bars and high bar. McFarlin is expected to be a leading force in the UMass gymnastics campaign.

Saturday night's competition at Curry Hicks proved that the Minutemen should lead the ECAC. With eight seniors returning to the squad, a strong season will be part of the routine. The next competition that the Minutemen will face will be the Nittany Lions of Penn State after the New Year.

6:18 mark of the opening period. Corazzini followed with an even-strength marker at 12:26, while Collins increased the Terriers lead to 3-1 at 16:54.

Nick Gillis netted his third goal of the season midway through the third period before Corazzini popped home his second of the night on the power play only 57 seconds into the third period.

"This win was real important for us," said Corazzini, who tallied a career-high four points with his two goals and two assists. "We have three league games coming up [before going back outside the league]. We just want to win as many as we can and get back to .500. Obviously, it was a good win for us tonight against a good team."

Martin Miljko recorded his sixth goal of the year with 9:31 left in the game, allowing him to move into a tie for the team-lead in points with Jeff Turner. The junior forward also set up Turner for the first UMass goal of the night.

However, the duo of Corazzini and Baker continued to shine against the Minutemen. A season ago, they teamed up for 13 points in the five meetings between the two teams. Friday night, they combined for seven points in the three-goal victory.

"I don't know what it is about playing against UMass," said Baker, who handed out three assists. "Up here [in Amherst], you have the big rink, and we're able to use our speed. But tonight we caught a couple of bounces, got some good shots on the power play and were able to work hard. I don't think it's anything about UMass, but if so, I wish it could translate over to the other teams."

The Terriers were also led by the play of junior goaltender Jason Tapp, who made 33 saves in goal for BU.

"I think he's been struggling as of late, and he knows it," said Parker of Tapp. "But he never quit and he never stopped competing. I thought that tonight was a little breath of fresh air for both him and for the team. He made some really nice saves."

The two teams returned to the ice on Saturday night at Walter Brown Arena for game two of the weekend set. To find out how the Minutemen fared in that one, check out the related story.

The Terriers got off to quick start in the contest when Dan Cavanaugh tallied from the doorstep to give BU a 1-0 lead only 2:33 into the game. All Cavanaugh had to do was shovel the puck into the open net as UMass goaltender Mike Johnson was out of position after a Freddy Meyer slap shot from the point hit John Sabo in front and bounced to the Springfield native.

"BU did what it had to do, and we can't solve our issue of taking untimely penalties," Cahoon said. "We've done it for quite a while now and it's killing us."

Carl Corazzini would double the Terrier lead ten minutes later when he scored in a four-on-four situation.

Tim Turner had a partial breakaway against BU goalie Sean Fields, but his shot went over the net and caromed to Jack Baker. Baker then fed a streaking Corazzini at the right wing boards and the captain made a spectacular move to beat Johnson for the goal.

Moment later BU would add its second power play goal of the period, as Mike Bussoli took a weak wrist shot from the right point that beat Johnson to the short side. The goal was made possible as the Terriers moved the puck around the perimeter until it was able to get a shot through a screen.

The Minutemen cut into the BU lead midway through the second period when Brad Nizwantowski tapped a rebound of his own shot to make the score 3-1. Nizwantowski's goal was the result of a Corazzini pass being intercepted by Samuli Jalkanen, who subsequently led the sophomore on a breakaway.

The two-goal deficit would be as close as the Minutemen would get for the remainder of the game, as the Terriers would tack on another goal early in the third period to put the game out of reach.

That goal, too, came on the power play when Meyer pinched in hard from the left point and skated with the puck around the back of the UMass net. As Meyer turned the corner to come to the front of the net, he blistered a wrist shot that went over the right shoulder of Johnson for the goal.

"I can't tell you the last period that we've been in a situation where the opponent's taken more penalties than we have," Cahoon said. "It's been our Achilles' heel all year."

The Maroon and White would again cut the lead to two goals when Kris Wallis scored off a scramble in front of fields at the 8:20 mark of the final frame. Jalkanen picked up his second assist on the night as his shot from the point hit Nizwantowski in front of the net. Nizwantowski found Wallis in the scramble who then slipped a shot past Shields.

The loss was the fifth straight for UMass, who are now winless in their last eight games with a tie to Connecticut in the middle of the draught.

"I've got some issues with my team in terms of discipline, in terms of intelligence," Cahoon said. "Until we become more disciplined and more intelligent out there we're going to continue to lose games."

Markus Helanen sprawls to make a circus save in a 5-2 loss to Boston University on Friday night at the William D. Mullins Center. The Minutemen aslo dropped a 4-2 decision to the Terriers on Saturday night at Walter Brown Arena on the campus of BU.

UMass drops two in California

Offensive problems plague Minutewomen throughout weekend

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN
The UMass women's basketball team lost a pair of games to San Francisco and Stanford over the weekend. The duo of losses brought the Minutewomen's record to 3-3 on the season.

Oh no, oh no, oh no. "Sometimes you need to get your butt kicked in order to learn something and, we certainly got it kicked tonight," Massachusetts women's basketball Head Coach Sonia O'Brien said after her team dropped its first game of the weekend.

UMass	50

Yesterday, No. 17 Stanford University (5-1) added to the West Coast Minutewomen's learning process by defeating the struggling Minutewomen (3-3), 85-50 inside the Naples Pavilion.

San Fran.	80

There's just not a lot to it. A young and rather inexperienced UMass team headed to California to take on two nationally recognized teams in two incredibly hostile environments – it just couldn't hit put the basketball through the rim. It looked like the Maroon and White were shooting extra large beach balls. And in the end, they lost both were Balls.

"You've got to make shots," O'Brien said after the Stanford loss. "Early on in the game Caroline got a couple of good shots. Amber got a couple of good looks. Paige got a couple of good looks. And we missed them. We spazzed out. We just lost our mind and we didn't have the composure just to hang there and wait for something to happen and get the next shot.

"It's the one thing about us right now that we don't have – and that's that composure," she continued. "Hopefully you get it by playing in atmospheres like this. We just need to be a little bit smarter and I hope it starts happening real soon. Otherwise we're going to have to make some changes."

With just over eight minutes gone by, the Cardinals had sprinted out to a 15-point lead. The Minutewomen would get to within 11. But that's it. They missed 15 of their first 15 shots – and that's what told the story. UMass shot an awful 29 percent from the field and added 25 turnovers to its already fine performance.

Both squads grabbed 36 rebounds, but the battle underneath the basket weren't significant in the outcome. Freshman Paige Harris hit the Maroon and White's only jumper from behind the arc – the only success in ten attempts. The Cardinal went 11 of 25 from the 3-level parking lot, a mark of 48 percent, draining five of them first-seven.

The Minutewomen weren't able to make their rotations quick enough to the Stanford gunslingers.

"Then we didn't get us as much as their ability to shoot the basketball," O'Brien said. "And any time you play good shooting teams – sometimes you're going to give things up and that's what happened tonight. They shot a little better than they normally do, but I'm not worried about that as much as us scoring fifty points. I mean it's ridiculous."

Nicole Powell scored 15 points and had eight rebounds for the Cardinal while Lauren St. Clair dropped in 12. The victory was coach Tara VanDerveer's 350th at Stanford.

Kathy Conner went 2-for-6 and scored 10 points to lead the Minutewomen. Jen Butler scored seven points on 3-for-17 shooting and grabbed a team-high eight boards. Butler was consistently hacked the entire game, but the officials failed to recognize it. Six-foot-6 center Carolyn Moos was just one of the menaces in the paint all day for Butler – who was frustrated by the bigger and taller Cardinal. Plus, Stanford's flailing-arm defense was constantly unnoticed by the refs. O'Brien wasn't pleased.

"In the first half we couldn't get a call," O'Brien. "I don't care what that man says, whoever he was. He was just blatantly cheating. And I don't normally say things like that but there's no way that Jennifer Butler [wasn't getting fouled]. You can't have three people around someone, all of them swinging and nobody hits her. The mere fact that he gave me a technical foul when I didn't even say anything was ridiculous."

On Friday afternoon, San Francisco just simply overpowered the visiting Minutewomen. Again, UMass couldn't shoot and was bombarded from behind the arc. The Lady Dons broke their school record, draining 12 treys for the 80-37 win.

The Maroon and White shot a poor 21.4 percent from the hardwood. Butler's six points were a team-high. And like the Stanford game, her three shots were the most that any Minutewoman drained. Siiri Liivandi grabbed a nine rebounds to lead the squad.

Frisco's Melanie Turner (13 points) had three of the Lady Dons eight three-pointers in the first half, to help her Lady Dons to the 32-17 lead after the first half. San Francisco scored 27 of the first 31 points of the last half to take the 60-21 lead with just over 10 minutes left in the game.

"We just did not have our defense. We got beat off the dribble, they kicked and they hit every open shot they had. We showed no composure and that's the thing that disappoints me the most. We didn't step back and make plays when we had to. It's just disappointing with the effort."

UMass loses pair in Hockey East

Terriers silence Mullins crowd

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

For a moment, it seemed like this might be the night in which the Massachusetts hockey team reacquainted itself with the style of play that saw it jump out to a 5-3-1 start through the first seven games of the season.

When senior captain Jeff Turner buried a power play goal at 2:39 into Friday night's game against Boston University, one could only wonder if the Minutemen were on the brink of snapping their six game winless streak.

Boston U.	5
UMass	2

Unfortunately for UMass, it hung with the Terriers for 60 minutes, yet was haunted once again by its nemesis – penalties. Four BU power plays resulted in three goals – the margin of difference in a 5-2 win for the visiting Terriers.

"I think that the game should have been right from start to finish, but we took ourselves right out of it," UMass-Amherst hockey coach Don Cahoon said. "It seemed like whatever team made fewer mistakes would win the game, and it was clear that BU made fewer mistakes than we did."

"My impression was that the game was played pretty much the way that we wanted it to [be played], with the exception of giving up some real easy goals," Cahoon added. "They had easy goals that were the because of major breakdowns, the result of the play being misread or the puck being misplayed. All of a sudden, the puck ends up in the back of our net."

Turner's goal was followed by five straight goals from BU, including two scores from senior captain Carl Corazzini. Power play tallies from Freddy Meyer and Brian Collins were lumped around Corazzini's first goal of the game, and just like that, the Terriers emerged from the opening 20 minutes up by two goals. Of course, that swing proved to be a big lift for a BU club that had lost six straight.

"We've been doing that [falling behind early] all year," BU hockey coach Jack Parker said. "We've been down 2-0 quite a bit in the first period of a number of games. So to be up 3-1 after the first period was very big for us."

In the National Championship campaign, Cahoon's BU team lost only two games. His Minuteman squad equaled that amount on Saturday night as they had fallen the previous night to the Terriers by a score of 5-2 at the William D. Mullins Center.

"It's a sigh of relief to get four points in the league and get back in the middle of the pack in the league anyways," BU Head Coach Jack Parker said. "I thought it was a real solid weekend by us – steady goaltending from both goaltenders. Played great on the power play both nights."

For the second night in a row the Minutemen were victimized by penalties as BU scored two power play goals in first period and added another in the third.

UMass stops losing streak at two with win over Cuse

In their first home match of the season, the Minutemen (4-2) opened up a commanding 79-30 lead after the first day of the two-day competition. The Minutemen swept all six events held on Friday and set four pool records in doing so.

Leading the charge for UMass was a pair of seniors, Mike Sabina and Chris Arsenault. Arsenault set the tone for the day by breaking the pool record in the 200-yard Individual Medley with a time of 1:52.25. Arsenault then moved on to collect his second and third pool records of the day in a pair of relays. First in the 200-yard Freestyle Relay, he teamed up with Sabina and a pair of freshmen, Ryan Fisher and Pete Mesavage, to take the event with a time of 1:23.53. Sabina and Arsenault then combined with fellow senior Billy Brown and sophomore Ryan Zaucha to win the 400-yard Medley Relay in 3:26.12.

Sophomore Tommy Keane rounded out the record setters by winning the grueling 1650-yard freestyle with a time of 16:03.22. The victory was Keane's third of the season with all three coming in freestyle events.

In the day's other two events, the Minutemen received outstanding performances from a pair of freshmen. Ryan Fisher was victorious in the 50-yard freestyle with a team season-best time of 21.28.

In the three-meter dive competition Logan Alomar almost broke the school record with a score of 503.55 in eleven dives. Alomar just missed the record of 506.90 set three years ago by Ed Hefferon. However, Alomar's score was good enough for second place on the UMass all-time list and to put him in the NCAA Zone Qualifier.

Day two was not much better for the Orangemen (2-2) as they were unable to overcome UMass' impressive lead from Friday. The Minutemen continued to dominate in the pool and kept breaking records in the process. The Maroon and White added another three pool records and one school record on Saturday to the four pool records set on Friday with Arsenault again leading the way.

With a time of 1:32.94 the UMass 200-yard medley team of Arsenault, Brown, Fisher and Zaucha broke the school record in the event. The quartet beat the old mark which was set during the 1997-98 season by almost a whole half a second.

Two more relay teams garnered first place finishes on Saturday to further cement the Minutemen's lead. In the 800-yard freestyle relay Arsenault, Keane, Zaucha and sophomore Rob Bellamy set a pool record with a time of 6:50.94 while the 400-yard relay team of Arsenault, Fisher, Mesavage and Sabina were equally impressive in placing first with a time of 3:07.71.

In individual events, Arsenault took two more first place finishes, first in the 100-yard freestyle with a time of 45.53 and then in the 100-yard flystroke in 49.24 seconds. These two triumphs gave the senior a total of eight over the weekend.

Keane picked up two more victories in freestyle events. In the 500-yard event Keane set another pool record with a time of 4:36.02 while he was also victorious in the 200-yard freestyle, finishing in 1:43.32.

The Minutemen return to action this Saturday when they head down to Connecticut to take on the Huskies.

Orangewomen dominate Minutewomen in victory

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

It took two days of fierce competition, but by the time it was over, the unblemished record of the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team had been smeared with juice and pulp.

The Syracuse Orangewomen were the first team all season to really take it to UMass at Joseph R. Rogers Jr. pool in Amherst. 'Cuse was clearly the superior squad in a dominating 240-130 victory.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Anne Dettloff

The meet, which took place over a two-day span, marked the first loss of the year for the Minutewomen.

From the outset of the meet the visitors were in control, taking a 72-38 lead after one day of competition. One of the few bright spots for the Maroon and White was the success of diver Kate Allery. The sophomore set a UMass record in the 10 dive one-meter event with a score of 424.50. Unfortunately the record was only enough for second place finish with Syracuse's Julie Van Deusen taking the victory.

Anne Dettloff garnered the lone UMass swimming win on Friday afternoon by claiming the 1650-yard freestyle in a time of 17:30.00.

Syracuse broke another pool record in the 200-yard individual medley with a time of 2:07.75. Becky Hunnewell placed third in the event for the highest UMass finish.

The Maroon and White went into Saturday's events with a deep hole to swim out of, but unfortunately for the Minutewomen no lifeguards were on hand to lower down a rescue ladder.

Despite the loss, freshman Christen Dexter continued her success in her still very young career. The recently anointed Atlantic 10 rookie of the week set a UMass record while winning the 200-yard breaststroke in a time of 2:22.20.

The Minutewomen were also victorious in the 400-yard freestyle relay. The team of Hunnewell, Dettloff, Andrea Kazanjian and Lauren Bulkeley set a pool record with a time of 3:35.51.

Massachusetts native Anne Tudryn performed well for Syracuse in breaking the pool record for the 100-yard breaststroke. Tudryn also won the 200-yard breaststroke for the Orangewomen.

The Orange and Blue set numerous other Rogers pool records including the 200-yard medley relay (1:49.77), the 800-yard freestyle relay (7:53.66) and the 400-yard individual medley (4:36.55) won by Melissa Brown.

Despite the loss the Minutewomen can take solace in the continued success of newcomer Dexter who is seemingly improving on a day-to-day basis. UMass is a very young team that is winning with top-notch performances from its underclassmen. Although such a lopsided defeat can be demoralizing, it can also serve as a learning experience for meets and years to come.

With the loss the Minutewomen drop to 5-1 on the season. UMass returns to the pool on the Dec. 9 when they travel to Storrs, CT to take on the UConn Huskies.

Hate crimes the focus as Shepard speaks out

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

Hate crimes may not be eliminated today, but by educating children we can help create a hate-free and diverse tomorrow, Judy Shepard said yesterday in a speech at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

Shepard is the mother of Matthew Shepard, a homosexual student at the University of Wyoming. Matthew Shepard was brutally killed by two men because of his sexual identity, and has since become an icon of the gay rights movement.

The money sent to help defray Matthew's medical costs was used to start the Matthew Shepard Foundation, an organization dedicated to the elimination of hate in all its forms. Judy Shepard has become a vocal advocate for equal rights and the stopping of hate. She has spoken before Congress and frequently makes speeches for colleges and high schools.

"I'm working for the rights of my children and my grandchildren and that's who are going to change the world," Shepard said.

She used the example of a five year old girl who, when asked the color of a new friend she had met on the first day of kindergarten, said that she "didn't look" to illustrate the point that children are not naturally born to hate.

"Everybody was born equal. We're not born with hate in our hearts. In the same token, we're not born with love in our hearts. We're taught," Shepard said.

She elaborated that she thinks education about diversity should begin almost at birth, so that it is no longer even diversity, just normality.

During her speech Shepard made the point that what she advocates is not just gay rights, but human rights.

"This is not a gay issue, this is an equal rights issue," she said.

In a video shown before the speech, Dennis Byrd Jr., a black man murdered in a hate crime, was mentioned. Byrd also appeared in Shepard's speech along with the families of Columbine high school as victims of the same hate that took the life of her son.

Despite all that she'd been through, Shepard said that she refused to give in to anger and hate as a reaction and that hope still dominated her life.

"If I am anyone in this room has the right to be angry, it would be me. But I've chosen not to," she said. "You can change the world. You can. You can do it alone, you can do it as a part of an organization."

Shepard then mentioned PFLAG and Glisten among others as organizations that are currently working to promote equality.

A question-and-answer period followed the speech in which the issue of parents rejecting their alternate lifestyle children came up.

"Families who reject their gay, lesbian, bi-sexual, transgender children is something that Dennis [Shepard, her husband] and I do not understand," Shepard responded.

She said that the mere fact that there is a term for such an act "throws away" says that it happens often enough that it needs a name, and that makes it all the more appalling. She said that, once again, education can help ease this phenomenon out of existence.

After an audience member brought up the subject of unacceptance by churches nationwide because of differing religious beliefs.

"Church hurts is one of the deepest hurts there is, in my opinion, and one of the most difficult to heal there is considerable uncertainty as to the precise grounds for the decision," the Court's decision said.

Florida Supreme Court spokesman Craig Waters said that the justices of the Court would meet on Monday to review their options.

In spite of the legal action, Florida's electors may be chosen by the state legislature who are considering a special session later this week to consider their appointment. The legislature has the power, under Article II Section 1 of the Constitution, to determine the manner by which the electors are chosen.

Asked about the possible legislative action, Gore said on CBS "60 Minutes" Sunday night, "I can't imagine they would do that."

Supporter of legislators have spoken of the necessity for naming a slate of electors prior to the state's December 12th legal deadline for designating electors to guarantee Florida's representation in the Electoral College. Republican legislators say they will only approve the group of electors awarded to Bush by virtue of his 537 vote lead in the state's certified tally.

The Electoral College is scheduled to meet on December 18th with electors from each state casting their vote for President. Neither candidate can win the necessary 270 electors votes to become the next President without the support of Florida's electors.

hearing panel is convened, its members culled from the Academic Honesty Board. The Board is made up of 18 faculty members, nine graduate students and nine undergraduate students.

The entire policy is outlined in the Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities' Code of Student Conduct. If an instructor suspects a student of dishonesty, procedure dictates the professor call the student in to discuss the incident. The professor and the student may reach an agreement and resolve the incident informally.

"At that time, the student may clarify, maybe there was a misunderstanding. Or the student says 'I have to confess to you, I didn't do that paper. It wasn't right.' The faculty member will sometimes say 'that's okay; we'll redo the paper. You'll redo the paper and we'll forget about it,'" Porter described.

If no agreement is reached, the professor may formally charge the student with academic dishonesty.

"If the faculty member determines that the serious enough to either fail the student for the paper or fail the student for the course the professor then writes a letter to the Academic Honesty Board," said Porter.

The letter is supposed to be forwarded to the student by the professor.

"Ideally, that it what is supposed to happen. One of the major charges in the policy this office once we receive the charge, then send a letter to the student saying that we've received the charge and outline the appeal and outline the timeframe. That didn't always happen under the old system," Wardwell explained.

The student can then appeal the charge by sending a letter to the Ombuds office.

"We then go through the process of establishing a hearing panel from the board," Porter said.

The five-member panel is made up of three faculty and two students, and each panel is different. The panels are assembled on a case-by-case basis. The panel can rule to uphold the sanction or rule in favor of the student. If the ruling is in the student's favor, no action is taken, and no record of any charge is kept. However, if the panel upholds the action a letter is sent to the Dean of Student's Office.

"We take the sanction from the Board and enter it in the record," said Special Assistant to the Dean Terry O'Donnell. A student's discipline record is confidential. However, it will appear on transcripts.

Porter wants students to be aware of the ramifications of such a record.

"Very often, schools where [a student] wants to transfer will ask to see copies of a student's records. And schools aren't looking for students that have been charged with academic dishonesty," he said.

Student hosts first gospel concert

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Paul Abrams is an excited man. The senior computer science major who is also the President of BASIC (Born Again Students in Christ) will oversee the first ever campus Gospel Concert.

The event starts at 7:00 p.m. and lasts until 10:30. It will take place in the Student Union Ballroom.

The event's goal, according to Abrams, is to share the "true meaning of Christmas" and to celebrate Christ.

"We're all about sharing the good news of Jesus Christ," Abrams said.

The concert will feature performances by two state choirs: Dubee and Freedom House. According to Abrams, Dubee has recently cut an album. But joining these two more nationally known acts will be local talent including Genevieve Legros, as well Dominic and Lisa Breen, the Gladden sisters, Rachel Jean-Marie and Marcus Barnett.

Jean-Marie will dance at the show while Barnett will recite poetry.

A representative of the Gladden Sisters said that they will perform both by themselves and with the Holy Temple Youth chair out of Springfield.

Abrams said that he is "definitely excited" about the event.

"This is the first time that we really get to go into the community," he said. "This is our first outreach in a sense. This is the first time for people to share what Christ means to them."

Abrams said he hopes that this event will focus more on the true meaning of Christmas. Because it is a time of reflection, Abrams said, people should have the opportunity to sit down and look at their purpose in life.

"It isn't about the gifts; this time of year is about Christ, the reason behind the season," Abrams said. "I hope people walk away from this event with maybe a hope they haven't had before. I hope they can walk away with the fact that there is a God that loves them, if I may be so bold."

Abrams hopes that, as a result of this event, University of Massachusetts might get its choir back.

"Amherst College has their own, official choir and yet, we're a really big school but we have no official choir," said Abrams. "Harvard and Boston University have theirs, so we hope that this might lead to a sort of resurrection, in a sense, of similar activities on campus."

The free event is open to all students and Abrams said that he expects other Christian RSOs to show up, as well as other area groups including MALCOM (More Abundant Life Christian Outreach Ministries) out of Springfield.

Zapatistas agree to talk about peace with President Fox

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

It has been seven years since the Zapatista National Liberation Army took over the small town of San Cristobal and declared war against the government. Now, in a historic move, newly elected president Vicente Fox has announced that he is committed to finding peace with the rebel forces.

Ever since Fox won the Mexican presidential elections over five months ago, he has been trying to reach out to the Zapatistas. However, it was not until three days ago that the NLA came forward to announce their willingness to talk to Fox.

Subcommander Marcos, of the NLA announced that he would only talk peace if the government were to make three crucial moves. First of all, the Zapatistas want the complete removal of government troops from seven guerrilla strongholds. The second demand they made was to release all the Zapatista members held in prisons across the country.

The third and main demand Marcos made in order to begin peace talks with Fox involved the legitimacy of the San Andres Accords. These accords were negotiated in 1996 between the Zapatistas and congressional mediators. They were a series of reforms that would give autonomy to the indigenous peoples of Mexico.

While the administration of former president Ernesto Zedillo blocked the accords from becoming law, President Fox has already shown commitment to the reforms by sending the accords to congress for a vote on Tuesday.

In addition to the three main objectives for peace, Fox has also started dismantling 53 government checkpoints throughout Chiapas. Marcos has stated that he sees this move as an act of good will, but will not consider Fox an ally for the Zapatistas yet.

Fox announced that the first order of business under his new administration would be to begin a dialogue between the Zapatistas and the Mexican government. He has also expressed his concern for human rights and the indigenous people of his country.

COURTESY WORLD WIDE WEB

A family huddles in front of a mural in Mexico City

"The suffering of Mexican Indians is unacceptable," Fox said in his inauguration speech, according to the Associated Press. "The need to change our policy toward these people is obvious."

Forty percent of Mexico's indigenous people live in Chiapas, he Zapatista headquarters. They are all descendents of the native people of Mexico from before the Spanish conquest. The NLA is mainly made up of Tzotzil and Tzeltal Indian peasants.

The Zapatista movement has given the people of Chiapas a voice and a hope for freedom from the poverty in which they live. Chiapas has been neglected. The people there plagued with inadequate food, health care, jobs and education. The NLA has become a united front with socialist intentions, fighting for an end to free trade and single-party politics.

Though there have been no direct battles lately, tensions continue to be heated between Zapatista supporters and groups that are tied to the government.

The Zapatistas began their fight against the government in 1984 after taking over a radio station and a prison in San Cristobal. The government reacted by killing over 100 rebel supporters. The NLA had timed their attack with the passing of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Another massacre took place in 1997 after Zapatistas took over the village of Acteal. At that time, the government killed 45 rebels.

So far Fox has granted the people of Chiapas at least one of their wishes: multi-party elections. In the latest election, Fox became the first man to take control of the Mexican presidency from the Institutional Revolutionary Party in 71 years.

The Zapatistas are planning to send a 24-leader delegation, including Marcos, to Mexico City in February to discuss conditions of peace with congress.

Deadly protests in Ivory Coast

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Five people were killed yesterday and five police officers were injured on the Ivory Coast in a bloody political protest. Despite bans from the government of the Ivory Coast, protesters went ahead with an anti-government march that the government speculated would cause both religious and ethical issues for the country.

The fledgling government of the country outlawed the protest because they were not informed early enough that it would be peaceful. Interior Minister Emile Boga Doudou said on state television on Sunday. He explained that government supporters would be on hand to prevent the march and to stop protesters.

The rally, which was held by the Republican Party of the country, organized on Monday to protest a Supreme Court decision to exclude party leader, Alassane Dramane Ouattara from the legislative election held on December 10th. The group plans upon boycotting the decision and also protesting the choice through anti-government marches.

Violent marches are not a rarity in the history of the Ivory Coast. In October, hundreds died following several days of street violence surrounding the country's presidential elections. In that case, junta leader General Robert Guei Ouattara declared himself the winner of the elections even though his opposition Laurent Gbagbo seemed to be the winner.

Because of this, Outtatra was banned from the presidential vote, and either way could not have been president because of doubts of his citizenship and questions about whether or not both of his parents were from the Ivory Coast.

An uprising brought Gbagbo to power, with promises of a government of national reconciliation.

Over 20,000 supporters of Ouattara took to the streets paralyzing the city with barricades of burning tires, torching cars and preventing people from traveling to work.

"It's total confusion. Our activists are in overdrive," Amadou Gon Coulibaly No. 3 in Ouattara's Rally of the Republicans (RDR) party, told Reuters.

Clashes occurred between protesters and residents of the Ivory Coast that defended their territory against rebels. Security forces pushed protesters away with both armored cars and tear gas. Ouattara activists opposed to the upcoming elections hope to see him on the ballot.

Possible relief in sight

Pakistan, India debate ceasefire in territory of Kashmir

By Jason Spears
Collegian Staff

Hopes for peace in Kashmir have risen after Pakistan and India say they are ready to reduce tensions in the country.

Indian Prime Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee announced the week old ceasefire in Kashmir could be extended if Pakistan makes a "conducive atmosphere" according to the BBC.

The current ceasefire was supposed to be only for the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

The Pakistan government appreciated the announcement and called for more dialogue to settle the conflict. Both the India and Pakistan claim Kashmir and have fought two wars over it since achieving independence from Britain in 1947.

In 1972 a ceasefire line divided Kashmir between the two countries, but most of Kashmir went to India.

Rebels based in Pakistan have been fighting since 1989 to either create their own separate homeland or fuse the Indian controlled Kashmir with Pakistan.

The Indian government claims the rebels are trained and equipped by the Pakistan. Pakistan says they only give the rebels moral support.

The possession of nuclear weapons by both countries has made the international committee press for a peaceful solution.

This ceasefire is the first one offered by Delhi since the beginning of the separatist movement in 1989, which has killed roughly 14,000 people.

Vajpayee says the extension of the ceasefire depends "on the realits on the ground" reports the BBC.

"Pakistan should stop cross-border terrorism, violence and maintain a friendly posture," said Vajpayee.

The prime minister's announcement followed the Pakistani government's offer to observe "maximum restraint" along the Line of Control separating the two armies in Kashmir on Saturday.

Since the offer the frontline has gone quiet according to the Indian government.

"Our forces have always practiced restraint and now they have been told to retaliate only under attack," said Indian Defense Minister spokesmen P Bhatnagar to the French news agency AFP.

Pakistan has dropped opposition to bilateral talks between India and Kashmiri separatists.

Pakistan foreign ministrys spokesman Mohammed Riaz Khan told the Associated Press that Pakistan would accept bilateral talks providing they lead to three way negotiations.

Khan said he would like talks to begin after Ramadan.

The previous ceasefire in August ended "over the issue of Pakistan inclusion in talks" according to the BBC.

Despite the ceasefire, the almost a dozen militant groups have continued attacks against the Indian government. Most of the militant groups have refused the Indian ceasefire claiming it is an attempt to shape international opinion.

However, the leader of the main alliance of Kashmiri separatist parties says the peace talks could lead to further the attempts for peace in Kashmir.

Abdul Ghani Bhat, leader of All Parties Hurriyat Conference asked for the release of people in prison for "their involvement in Kashmiri struggle" in a statement for Reuters.

"By releasing the boys, India can show it means business about a dialogue," said Bhat according to the BBC.

The show must go on: Gore right to fight

Al Gore and George W. Bush have battled it out.

There have been legal battles and name-calling, vote counts and recounts, victories in the Supreme Court and the court of public opinion.

Both are doing their job.

Both were candidates in a fiercely contested national election, both were the recipient of suspect or non-existent votes and both are now paying the consequences.

Bush won his recount while Gore lost his, but both have an obligation to keep fighting this out, to not just "give up" the most powerful office in the World.

Bush can continue to say that Gore should just "concede" as if it simply an act of a defeated person, as if this is admitting that the shot came after the shot clock expired, the ball was caught out of bounds or that the full house beats the royal flush, but it isn't.

It's much more important than that and Bush needs to respect that.

He needs to respect that, by all accounts, blacks were prevented from voting in Florida, poor machines discounted votes, ballots were set up illegally, and he probably won what will go down as one of the most crooked elections in American history. For Bush to maintain that he is a "uniter" he must be willing to let the other side carry their fight out to the painful end.

Gore, for his part, has said that if it can be proven to him that he lost this election, that it wasn't stolen from him, then he will give Bush all of the support he needs. On the one hand, Gore has to say this. He can't declare his opposition to somebody who beat him – it's not the gentlemanly thing to do. But that, despite the massive fighting that is currently going on, he is willing to say that is a statement on his character. He's willing to admit that he lost, but he has to know that he lost.

And it isn't fair of his opposition to tell him that he needs to concede because a pro-Bush Republican declared the Republican the winner, despite these massive voter irregularities. Not only is her hypocrisy dangerously suspect, but also the fact that blacks were harassed and possibly kept from the voting booths should be reason enough for Katharine Harris to oppose elections.

The Daily Collegian is absolutely sick of the ongoing election controversy, but at the same time, it must go on. Votes must be counted, and that some candidates would suggest otherwise is a dangerous slight to American democracy. Every voter has a voice – that's the reason that our political system works. In general anyway.

But that general feeling can't be threatened anymore than it might already have been. It cannot be threatened in uncounted votes, It can't be threatened in harassed voters, and politically motivated politicians making decisions in their own best interest certainly can't threaten it.

That is what Gore is fighting. We truly believe that he will give up when it is clear that, fairly, he has lost this election, but there is no way he lost this election fairly. Until it can be proven that he has, Gore should continue to fight, If not then for the common voter whose voice politicians more interested in are threatening self-progress than worried about American decline.

If some of our politicians don't oppose those that feel that way, who will?

Jerry's ghost firing up the place

MICHAEL SALEMME

Since the passing of Jerry roughly five years ago, the other members of the Grateful Dead have been doing solo projects or playing with other musicians on tours across the country. The Other Ones, Phil and Friends, and Ratdog.

to name a few, are all tour with at least one former Dead member. This past semester I've toured with all three of the above bands, but have never experienced anything close to what happened on that Saturday night.

I had my brother Dave get tickets for my girlfriend and I to see Ratdog and the Persuasions at the Palladium. The Persuasions, an all acapella group, are currently on tour as Ratdog's opening band promoting their new album Might as Well. Persuasions Sing the Grateful Dead. They walked onstage dressed appropriately, of comically wearing double-breasted suits with brilliant tie-dye t-shirts underneath. The caroling Persuasions opened the show with a delightful set of their interpretations of various Dead tunes. From a smooth and mellifluous "Black Muddy River" to a truly touching "Ripple," their soulful harmony was received gratefully by the audience. Perhaps most touching, however, was a prayer the band said for Jerry. The band members huddled arm-in-arm and together swayed side-to-side as they hummed a sweet and slow rhythm and, looking up at the ceiling, offered: "Jerry, if you're looking down on us tonight... we're gonna do a moment of silence for you." While the band set the stage (literally), the audience remained silent with everyone bidding (not goodnight) respect and loss for their departed Captain. Here we were, a couple thousand strong, packing a relatively large theater, praying together for a man we all treasured beyond compare for his musical talent. And then... another long, strange trip began.

Soon after the prayer, the Persuasions left the stage and the house lights brightened to allow the audience a breather between acts. However, we were never meant to see Ratdog that evening. As the venue lit up, I remember turning around and looking up at the people seated in the balcoms above us, and wondering why they were being ushered to the stairs on either side of the building. The place was on fire!

As this disturbing though began to slowly sink in for me, I momentarily ignored the usher's pleas to evacuate the floor, and, instead of exiting, instead of grabbing my girlfriend and trying to escape the billowing smoke, I paused for a minute. Now, if you were there, and I guess that too many of you weren't, you might have paused too. You might have paused if you realized that it was no more than ten minutes since the prayer had passed and yet, all of a sudden, out of nowhere, the building was on fire. You might have paused of you believed that communication with the "dead" was possible. You might have paused if you were as optimistic a Deadhead as I am. And if all three suit you, then, like me, you have no choice but to believe that Jerry Garcia set the Worcester Palladium on fire.

Jerry, what have you done? Some of you might expect that I would be upset that Bob Weir wasn't going to play that night. After all, I had traveled all the way to Worcester from my hometown of Cheshire, CT, to catch the show. But, it turned out that the evening wasn't going to be a tragedy after all. What with Jerry showing his presence in his own unique way, and with enough gas and a purple lunchbox filled with cheese and crackers, we formed an alternate plan.

A bunch of miles away, back towards my hometown, a band was playing that would definitely cheer me up. Connecticut's premier Grateful Dead cover band, Shakedown, was playing at the Ultimate Cafe in Middletown.

So... we packed up our cheese and crackers and headed back to Connecticut. Even if Bob wasn't going to play St. Stephen, and even if Jerry set the building on fire, Shakedown would give us one more chance at a Saturday night. And what a great time we had. We walked through the door just as the band was priming for their second set. The crowd was obviously smaller than at the Palladium, but for what it lacked in numbers, it made up with cheerfulness and enthusiasm. The band played a rare and rising "Truckin'" and an awesomely fierce "Sugar Magnolia." My wonder at how we were, somehow, at another Deadesque concert was great, but it wasn't as great as the music.

And so, just as the death of Jerry Garcia didn't stop the vibes, the cancellation of the Ratdog show didn't stop us from finding the good times. The fire turned out to be a very heartwarming experience for this deadhead.

Even with Jerry's passing, there remains a community of friends, family and familiar faces that still dance around the music.

The Grateful Deal disbanded some time ago, and while going to see them is no longer an option, new bands and tributes continue to perform their music in fresh, crisp and creative ways. It is both amazing and extraordinary that on a night without Jerry, and without Bob, still there was a place to call home for those who love the music.

Thank you, Shakedown, for a wonderful time. Bob Weir I want my money back and to that cop who screamed "the show is cancelled because the fucking building is on fire," at me: screw you.

Jerry is far from forgotten; the trip is for from over and the fire thopefully by now (all but extinguished.

BRIAN LOHNES

I'm destined for something. Lord knows what it is, but every once in a while it seems that the current career path I am on gives me a little boost. I have been lucky enough to get opportunities to do things that are really cool and at the same time great resume boosters.

Anyone who knows me knows that I am obsessed with cars, basically to the exclusion to all other things in my life. Sure it's sad, but I love it. That being said I am also a journalism major, so I hope to be able to go into the field of, hold on here, automotive journalism. "Ha! Ha!," you say, that doesn't exist, you are just making it up like the fact that you have a girlfriend. Honestly, that is the field that I have been longing to get into for the last twenty or so years, and I do have a girlfriend who is in fact real.

I guess I could already call myself a junior automotive journalist because of work that I have done for various web sites, magazines, papers and other miscellaneous things. I will get to those later.

Getting back to my original point, has anyone ever had the feeling like everything they do in life is somehow going to pay off later on? I have had that feeling for several years now and it is pretty weird how all of it seems to be coming together now. I've had the feeling that "someone" had a plan for me for a while now, simply because of the kinds of opportunities I have been able to indulge in over the last few years.

Last summer, I got a job as a reporter for "Pit Talk" magazine, a regional road racing publication, and along with that job I also got hired as the track announcer at New Hampshire International Speedway for all of the road races there. So there I was a couple of hundred feet in the air, in the announcer's booth with my voice blaring over the infield at the massive racing complex in New Hampshire and I thought, "Wow, this is cool." Now, prior to my days at "Pit Talk," I had written for the New England Dragway News, a small publication that circulates about 40,000 copies per month. I was also a race reporter for those folks.

Fast forward to the end of this fall when I got hired as the Saturday track announcer at Lebanon Valley Dragway in West Lebanon, New York. Once again I found myself hearing my own voice broadcast out over the expansive grounds at Lebanon Valley Dragway and I thought, "Wow this is cool."

Then there was the news that I got on Saturday night. Yours truly may be doing radio spots on 106.9 FM for an indoor kart racing track that was just built in this area.

The strange thing about all of these opportunities I have had is that they have all seemingly fallen out of the sky into my lap. The New Hampshire gig happened because someone forwarded me an e-mail that they were looking for someone to do it. I never expected them to accept a lowly college guy. I guess I probably gave them the low offer money wise. I did it for free.

The other major break I caught was because of another guy getting a job. David Kennedy has the same unhealthy automotive obsession I have, and he is currently employed at Peterson's 4 Wheel and Off-Road Magazine. Essentially, he is living my dream job except for the fact that he's a truck guy and I am more into cars, but overall he is doing what I want to do someday.

At this point in my life I am trying to gain as much experience and knowledge of the craft as I can. What used to look like an unattainable pipe dream now seems like something that I can actually accomplish and succeed at. All I know is that if an opportunity ever comes up for you to do something that has the potential to further along a dream that you have, whether or not you think you can do it, try. If you do try and fail, you gave it your best and it wasn't meant to be. If you don't try and you never know how you would have done, you will be kicking yourself quite possibly for the rest of your life.

I've failed at stuff before and I probably will again, but the one lesson I have learned over the last several years, is not to leave any stone unturned. I haven't and so far it looks like the correct strategy.

I have to credit the UMass Motorsports Club with a lot of the stuff that I am currently doing. The club is a great place for any guy or girl who is into, cars, trucks, racing, four wheeling or whatever. Trust me, if you have an interest there are people in that club that are into it too. They are a great group of people and they love helping each other out.

Hell, they even have a University sponsored racecar that you can drive!

By the way, they meet every Wednesday in the Campus Center, room 162.

Thoughts of a mind still on Thanksgiving break...

MATT DESPRES

Flushing out the thoughts of a mind still on Thanksgiving break... I understand the need for control and a sense of calm in the dorms on campus, and thus realize that RA's are a must in residential buildings. However, I also realize the need to allow residents to function as normal human beings. Some of the RA's (some, remind you, not all) on-duty in Northeast do not. What they are intent on enforcing are silent hours, not quiet hours, and routinely interfere in matters that should be no concern of theirs. Their holier-than-thou attitudes precede them, and an overpowering desire to deliver complete silence to every inch they cover is entirely unfair to all residents. Is it necessary to write up an individual for leaving a lone pair of sneakers tucked away by a corner room? If that's a fire hazard, then the RA of the same floor should have been written up as well, for having a giant pumpkin outside his room for the better part of a week. Is it OK to reprimand someone for talking on the phone, in their room, door closed, because you had your ear up against the damn thing? Absolutely not. I wasn't aware that we had each been assigned a den mother to keep tabs on our every move. To those RA's who treat us like peers and do justice to the job, thanks. To those on a power trip, get over it. It's a poor show that results in a lack of respect.

Writing the 100th random column this week: Tough thing to justify.

It's been 20 years, already – two long decades of life without John Lennon. He would have been 60 this year, and undoubtedly still pushing and molding musical boundaries. I was barely a year into my own life as his ended, and yet I feel, along with countless others, somehow connected to the man. His music was that good, his personality that vibrant. What's left to say about him that already hasn't been written 10 times over? Do yourself a favor and listen to the Plastic Ono Band album for a taste of what hardcore is, bred purely from the soul of one of our most beloved songwriters.

God bless the girls at Rao's. Best coffee and service around. Great job by them.

At home the other day with nothing to do, I tuned into the VH1 My Music Awards, the first show of it's kind "by and for the fans." Perhaps the single worst televised event I have ever seen. Low points? Each and every time John Leguizamo opened his mouth, and all the dead air in between. Even U2 was flat. Didn't think it was possible. High points? Gwen Stefani.

I have no beef with Parking Services, no complaints or gripes. I don't own a car.

My regards to David Spade, who was attacked with a stun gun last week in his California home. After the attack and ensuing struggle, Spade emerged relatively unscathed. Couldn't be happier, really, but still I wonder: who is this person that needed to struggle with Mr. Spade? He's not exactly the world's most intimidating specimen...

David Spade: Tough person to taser.

"The Daily Show" on Comedy Central has had the best and most consistent coverage of the still ongoing Presidential election. The move to call the coverage "Indecision 2000" months ago proved to be prophetic, and, as it turns out, widely imitated as the networks realized they had been trumped by John Stewart and Co. Its intelligent humor has been a welcome break in a medium that generally caters to a lower intelligence level. Well done.

It's a shame when some of our most beloved entertainers become better know for their battles with addiction than because of the work they have lent their talent to. The latest, of course, is Robert Downey Jr. He's on a well-worn path that some have been fortunate enough to get off of. Here's hoping that he weathers through his most recent relapse and resurfaces in the near future.

Sometimes, just sometimes, students at this school resort to alternative methods of entertainment to keep themselves amused. Djibouti, however, does not amuse. It fulfills a deeply rooted desire in the human psyche to express our natural and animal tendencies in a congenial yet aggressive manner. A simpler explanation: cardboard, and lots of it.

The world would be a better place if everyone were given a copy of On the Road at birth. Perhaps the greatest piece of text ever produced, the book is saturated with a voice and wisdom that most writers will never approach.

I miss Soundgarden. They rocked. Hard.

If there was any question at all, I'm here to settle the matter once and for all: Winona Ryder is, by far, the most beautiful woman working in entertainment today.

Ted Allen is the greatest guitarist that you'll never hear of.

"Hi Mom, it's Matt...listen, I think I may have impregnated a chad..."

My guilty viewing pleasure as of late has been The Real World. I know, I've been sucked in by the commercial machine that is MTV, lumped into a viewing audience comprised of myself and 14-year-old girls. I have no issues with that.

Column space is a terrible thing to waste. I am so, so sorry.

Spy who captured Nazi speaks at Columbia

By Jamie Hodari
Columbia Daily Spectator (Columbia U.)

(U-WIRE) NEW YORK – After successfully completing one of the most famous spy missions of the 20th century, Peter Malkin was disappointed. He had captured Adolf Eichmann in 20 seconds, but that was 11 seconds over his goal.

"I could have made the capture in nine seconds," said Malkin, the former head of operations for the Israeli Secret Service and the man who captured the mastermind of Nazi Germany's "final solution."

Malkin spoke to a group of over 100 students and community members at the Kraft Center last night, telling the story of his most famous operation. Israel Va'ad, the Israeli affairs section of Columbia University's Hillel, sponsored the event.

"I think that we were very fortunate to have him," said event organizer Tami Heisler, BC '03. "I was happy that so many people came on such short notice."

In 1960, Eichmann had been living in Argentina for 15 years under the alias Ricardo Clemente. When the Israelis received a tip that Clemente might actually be Eichmann, they sent a team to bring the ex-Nazi to Israel so he could stand trial there. Malkin headed the team, planning the logistics of Eichmann's capture as well as carrying out the crucial step of grabbing Eichmann and throwing him into the getaway car.

In contrast with the traditional perception of spies as cold and calculating, Malkin gave a very emotional speech, appearing to be on the verge of tears at one point.

"It was inspirational; I like that he weaved in the message that we should never forget," said Dalia Gefen, BC '02. "He put in his personal touch. It makes you realize how important he was."

Malkin shared his personal connection to the mission, explaining that his father and sister had died in the Holocaust. Although he was sworn to secrecy, Malkin finally told his mother about what he had done when she was on her deathbed.

"Mother, I am the man who captured Eichmann," Malkin said, recounting his final conversation with her. "She held my hand and said, 'I knew you never forgot your sister.'"

"It sent chills up my spine when he said that," said Rena Fruchter, BC '03.

Malkin was born in Palestine in 1929 and grew up in Poland. During the 1948 Israeli war of independence, Malkin joined the Israeli army. A few years later he became a spy in the Mossad, Israel's secret service.

"When I had my interview for the Mossad, they asked me why I wanted to be a spy. I said, 'Because I love adventure.' I think I was supposed to say 'because I love my country,'" Malkin said.

While Malkin's speech was very personal at times, it sometimes sounded like it came from a James Bond movie.

"It was an eight man operation. One man was sent to learn about Eichmann's surroundings... Another man was sent to rent eight houses and nine to 10 cars," Malkin said. "You always have to change cars, and you have to have many safehouses in case something goes wrong... We had a mechanic to put Israeli engines in the cars so that they wouldn't break down... We had an interrogator and a forger. In Argentina, a driver's license takes six months; [our forger] took less than 30 minutes... We had a doctor, to give Eichmann a step-by-step injection that would make him look drunk ... and we had me. I was familiar with operations, I was a black belt, and I was a master of disguise," Malkin said.

As evidence of his ability to create disguises, Malkin told an anecdote about a time when he had fooled his own mother into believing he was an American tourist.

"I had fake teeth to make my voice different and another set of fake teeth that made my face look different, and I had a cap," said Malkin.

Malkin also focused on the 11 days he spent with Eichmann in a safehouse in Argentina, waiting for an opportune time to smuggle him back to Israel.

"I never got angry at him because I wanted to find out [the location of] Dr. Mengele and Boorman. Bot he was the most wanted Nazi criminal in the world, so [other Nazis] had run away from him," Malkin said.

After the speech, Malkin stayed to answer questions and sign copies of his book, Eichmann in My Hands.

"Schindler's List on the Prairie" subject of book

By Bethany Snyder
Daily Illini (U. Illinois)

(U-WIRE) CHAMPAIGN, Ill. – The connection between Iowa and the Holocaust might seem weak, even nonexistent. Author Michael Luick-Thrams, who wrote a book about an Iowa hostel that harbored Holocaust refugees, nonetheless gave merit to this connection when he visited the University of Illinois this weekend.

He discussed his book, Out of Hitler's Reach: The Scattergood Hostel for European Refugees 1939-45, Friday at the International Studies building.

The hostel was originally a boarding school for Quakers before it became a Schindler's List on the prairie. It housed 185 war-torn refugees, 23 of who were children. The volunteers, who were Quakers and college students, provided health care, job assistance and language training – inevitably Americanizing the refugees.

"I first thought, how dare the Quakers take the culture from them. But when I talked to the refugees, they told me to get over it. Many had scrubbed sidewalks in Europe. Most didn't want to go back," Luick-Thrams said.

Megan Friedrich, a junior in LAS, attended the lecture because of an interest in the Holocaust – a subject she learned about from her father. Others in the audience included professors and people from the community with an interest in the World War II era.

The hostel's operation put pressure on the line between racism and acceptance at a time when racist overtones reverberated throughout America.

"They were saving the Jews, yet they didn't want to be accused of Jewish-coddling," Luick-Thrams said.

One woman who applied for a staff position at the hostel was even rejected, with her face suggested as a possible cause. When European refugees were no longer able to journey to Scattergood, the Quakers suggested using the hostel to help relocated Japanese Americans. The townspeople rejected the idea. Ironically, Scattergood Hostel, created to neutralize racism, closed because of conflicting race relations. It has now returned to a Quaker boarding school.

The Quakers chose Iowa because they felt it offered the refugees job opportunities and easier integration into American society. The refugees came from Berlin, Prague, Vienna and Budapest.

"In many cases, they (volunteers) couldn't even pronounce the names," said Luick-Thrams in his video entitled Out of Hitler's Reach.

The volunteers had no training in post traumatic stress syndrome, only a passion devoted to helping, Luick-Thrams said. Yet he said even if the volunteers taught the refugees perfect English, until the people found their own centers, the practical training would not have made a large impact.

"One refugee would come down to the pantry at night and steal lard. He had known hunger, but by that point the hunger probably wasn't just physiological, it was also psychological," Luick-Thrams said in the video.

"When you're under that much stress, you have to vacate your life, your body, just to survive."

Scattergood Hostel was a place where "people's souls, people's spirits could regain their bodies and biographies."

Oregon State gets ready for Hanukkah

By Kristie Deroia
OSU Daily Barometer (Oregon State U.)

CORVALLIS, Ore. – The holidays are here and celebrations have begun. For students who practice Judaism, the approaching of Hanukkah is a quiet time to commemorate the rededication of the second temple by Judah the Maccabee and take part in the traditional lighting of the menorah.

"It's a very cozy holiday – a time when the family gets together," said Holly Abrams, president of Oregon State University's Jewish Student Union, Hillel.

She explained that it's not as large a holiday as Yom Kippur or Passover, but it is a time of celebration that incorporates additional rituals and prayer into day-to-day practices. As Hillel's president, Abrams spearheads events and celebrations for her members and as one of several active student unions offered on campus, Hillel was organized to provide a support system for Jewish students.

"I feel that we bring Jewish students together to celebrate who we are," Abrams said.

Hillel exists on campuses across the nation and was established at OSU around the same time that the Beit Alef community group became a presence in Corvallis.

"It's at least 30 years old," said Jill Schuster, a Hillel faculty advisor, adding that there is lot of depth in terms of the Jewish heritage in Corvallis.

In fact, Hillel is recognized not only nationally but all over the world and even has a unique link to Israel through oceanography programs offered in both Israel and at OSU, Schuster said.

"It is an international organization with international funding," Abrams said.

Hillel offers Jewish students the opportunity to interact with each other and members get together to honor their religion, share experiences and go on retreats.

The union, which tends to schedule events rather than meetings, often provides traveling opportunities to its members, in order to celebrate Jewish holidays with other Jewish groups across the nation.

Hillel participated in two big events in November. The first, a retreat to Olympia, Wash., was arranged to celebrate Shabbat. Members from Jewish student unions throughout the Northwest were in attendance.

There was also an event held in Chicago where Ehud Barak, Elie Wiesel and Bill Clinton were a few of the famous guest speakers. The occasion, known as the UJC General Assembly, is the largest gathering of Jewish professionals, lay leaders and students in the United States.

Hillel paid for four of its members, including Abrams, to attend.

"It was really beautiful because we had Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist Jews participating together," she said.

Other traveling opportunities are offered to Hillel members throughout the year, including a free trip to Israel that provides Jewish students the opportunity to learn more about their heritage.

Several 10-day sessions are offered during the winter, spring and summer months to Jewish students between the ages of 18 and 26. The trip is paid for through a $300 million endowment fund created for the purpose.

Abrams said Hillel is currently looking into sending at least one of its members to Israel this year.

"Throughout the year, Hillel sends large numbers of students to various events," Abrams said.

In addition to honoring the Jewish lifestyle and celebrations, Hillel has had positive ties to the Women's Center – whose staff has always welcomed them, Abrams said.

The two joined forces last year to raise sheets around a display, which compared abortion to the Holocaust. Abrams said they weren't trying to take sides on the abortion issue, but rather give people the choice whether or not to look at the pictures.

One of Hillel's goals at OSU is to raise awareness and sensitivity of the Jewish lifestyle and its holidays. Schuster said she would like to see important Jewish holidays recognized on Oregon State's annual calendars. She believes it would be helpful for university event planning that may exclude the attendance of the Jewish community due to its celebrations.

"This time of year, there are a lot of Jewish holidays," Schuster said.

Hillel will be putting up a large menorah in the MU Lounge when Hanukkah begins Dec. 21 and many of its members as well as others from the Corvallis Jewish community will take part in a celebration at Chintimini Senior Center, located at 2601 Tyler St. The festivities will be Dec. 10. Food, games and music will be provided. The fee is $5 for students.

Blur collection stunning

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

BLUR
Blur: The Best Of Virgin Records

COURTESY PEROU
Blur: purveyors of fine Brit-pop.

Britpop has always been something Americans have received in manageable doses, ingesting a little Oasis, a little Manic Street Preachers, and as much Supergrass as our addiction to Matchbox 20 would let us enjoy.

And, of course, "Song 2." Oh yes, you know the one I'm talking about. "WOOO-HOOO!" That simultaneously irresistible and infuriating tune comes to us courtesy of Blur, one of Britain's premiere pop/rock bands, and one which American radio listeners have only sampled in unrepresentative bits and pieces.

With the release of Blur: The Best Of, however, a remedy has arrived, in the form of an 18 track album introducing us to the full breadth of style Blur has traversed over its last seven albums. From their origins in short, highly danceable pop ditties to their recent dabblings in extended moodiness and gospel, and through all sorts of quirky, experimental territory, Blur has managed to produce an excellent catalogue of hits which, as enjoyable as any individual song may be, doesn't truly impress a listener until thrown into the sort of heterogeneous heap that is a best-of album.

And quite a heap it is; the 18 tracks are so diverse as to appear the product of different bands entirely. The first two tracks, "Beetlebum" and "Song 2," are both from the band's 1997 self-titled fifth album, presenting the Blur most familiar to American ears. They're harmless and easy to like, but ultimately the most forgettable, so perhaps it's just as well that they're put out of the way early on. As unassuming invitations, however, they get the job done, and bleed nicely into the much older "There's No Other Way," off of Blur's 1991 debut album, Leisure. Carefree, retro-feeling pop rock doesn't get much better; this is the sort of song for which repeat buttons were made.

From there, the album begins to subject the listener to Blur's less accessible tracks, but for those willing to give such idiosyncratic gems as "Coffee and TV" and "No Distance Left to Run" a few listens, the excellent songwriting and intriguing production of even Blur's most unprecedented tunes is astounding. The songs swing between emotional density ("The Universal") and outright goofiness ("Charmless Man"), and all of it impresses.

Perhaps this sort of observation should go without saying on a best-of album, but it begs mention all the same; there isn't a weak moment to be found. The context of surprise and nonlinearity lets even the most oddball track feel like it belongs.

In addition to the 18 track best-of disc, the album also comes with a second 10 track live disc, recorded at the Wembley Arena in December of 1999. In one sense, this is an obvious play for the money of fans that own all of the other albums and have no need for a best-of collection. In another sense, however, it's a great addition to an already stellar release. The sound quality and mix is excellent, and the only weakness, really, is the similarity of the live renditions to the studio cuts. Only two of the songs on the live disc don't appear on the best-of disc, making it a fairly redundant listen, but enjoyable nonetheless. Highlights include the energized "Girls and Boys," on which singer Damon Albarn rustles up some raucous audience participation.

Whether you're a fan of the band, a fan of the genre, or only casually interested in Brit pop, this album has something to offer.

The Water Bra: how it stacks up

What's soft and squishy, weighs about the same as "The Everday Writer" (I KNOW that you all have that book still unopened on your shelves from freshman year College Writing) and is representative of the way that women are objectified in our patriarchal society? (Women's Studies rears it's head!) Yeah, that's right – The Water Bra. After seeing so many ridiculous Victoria's Secret ads in which supermodels stand around stretching in their underwear while a seductive voice talks (note – women do not stand around stretching with their friends in their underwear), I decided to check out for all my loyal readers what the deal with the water bra really was.

Due to limited cash flow, I had to skip out on the $40 Victoria's Secret and Express versions and hit T.J. Maxx, where they had "The Original Water Bra" on clearance for $7.00. That's the kind of price I like to see. Especially when I was putting the bra through a series of tests. Fashion today dictates that women are supposed to be very thin, with voluptuous chests. That's basically impossible naturally, but with a little help from the Water Bra, it might just be doable. But what are the dangers of this Water Bra? Will it freeze while you sled? Will it implode on impact? I donned my stylin' lab coat, a pair of bejeweled goggles, and started the testing.

Style FILE with Shauna Billings

Test #1 – The Freezer. The packaging said that the bra was "filled with water, not silicone or rubber." Sweet deal, I thought, as I raced into my friends' kitchen and hucked the bra into their freezer, between the frozen corn and bean burritos. I was expecting to open the freezer in four hours to find it rock solid. But those crafty inventors were quicker than I expected, and they must have used saline or pure oil, because sadly it did not freeze. However, it did get ice cold, and remained that way for a good while. Do I note a quick cool down trick for summer?

After conducting Test #1, my friends and I were getting ready to hit a party when they convinced me I should test out the Water Bra in a party setting. So I tossed it on, after letting it get all thawed out of course. My first reaction was to be all squirmy and grossed out, as it wasn't at all normal feeling. But then I checked myself out in the mirror, saw that it looked pretty good (okay, okay – it was the chest I've always wanted), and grabbed my coat.

The packaging claims that "Only you will know it's not all you." That holds true only if no one knows that you are writing an article about it. Eventually, pretty much everyone there knew I was wearing a Water Bra (including the strange people on the couch). As I am not a very flirty and chest sticking out kind of girl, I was getting a little embarrassed from all the teasing. Two of my guy friends were relentless, deciding to change lyrics of songs to humorous little ditties about the Water Bra. And I would also like to apologize to Dave for slapping him, a slap that nevertheless through the sound, I know my own strength apparently. But despite the teasing, I can say that I would have worn the Water Bra again, if it had survived its remaining test.

Test #2 – The Hot Pot. After the ladies in my house, the next morning I decided to see what would happen when you heated it up. I nearly started a fire when I threw it into the microwave. I forgot about the metal parts. (Note to self: fire = bad.) I was only an engineering major for a couple days. Think woman, think! Seeing all crafty, I boiled up some water in my hot pot and tossed the bra in. Again, not too quick on an idea because it made my room smell incredibly moist. Apparently nylon, spandex, polyester, cotton and rubber are not meant to be cooked on high for 10 minutes. (Keep covered, and stir often.) However, the Water Bra did heat up well. Could catch on for those freezing 5K runs, and it also doubles nicely as a heating pad for ab workout-related injuries!

Test #3 – The Puncture. We said Note is all females do not understand internet memes. For anyone come near you with a pin while wearing a Water Bra: Narrowly and escape do not mix with excessively pressured shake of hand. I tried punching the bra with a pin, and the liquid just moved out for a few seconds and then flooded out. The bra was very quick as natural sticking with one side deflated and the area all filled up. Avoid objects at all costs.

Test #4 – The Sly Story Drop. Remember all those contests in middle school when you had to create a device that could hold an egg and keep it from breaking? Mine always consisted of mass quantities of bubble wrap. But I think I've found a material that may be equal, or even beat it: egg-saving power. I dropped the Water Bra from a six-story window, expecting the bra to burst like a water balloon when it came into contact with the pavement below. But when I ran down to see all that I found was a kid looking at me strangely, as if I was some kind of pick up line that I tossed a bra down at him. The bra (which was already destroyed on one side due to Test #3) did not burst. It had survived a 50-60 foot drop. Instead of gaping holes, bra is empty and should just wrap themselves in water bras when leaving.

Test #5 – The Dissection. Due to the failure of Test #4, I was able to cut open the bra and check out what made it tick. It was as expected – inside the Water Bra is plastic baggy, filled with water. Until Jon Gross writes exactly was inside for liquid, but it was clear. And it's not just water as they like to advertise. Lying bastards. In conclusion toh the lab words of the Water Bra does give you a more defined figure. And it might be fun on occasion. But you should be happy with your own self-image. Being you is beautiful, and you don't have to worry about anything bursting when there are sharp objects present!

Krakow settles into the Hadley Pub

By Ned Dunn

KRAKOW
Hadley Pub
November 29, 2000

Krakow brought their live act west Wednesday night November 29 as they entertained an enthusiastic crowd at the Hadley Pub.

The band, who has gained a good following in central and eastern parts of the state is kicking off an indefinite amount of shows that they will be playing at the Hadley Pub on Wednesday nights.

They have played at numerous venues in the Boston area, including both upstairs and downstairs in the Middle East and Bill's Bar. They were also part of Phish's Lemonwheel Festival in Maine. The band is from Dartmouth area and this past summer walked away from the Rock of Ages 2000 Battle of the Bands title. That honor gave them $10,000 and interest from radio stations.

This latest western Massachusetts show is one of the first for the band. They opened the show with "Release," from their 1998 CD Krakow 1445. A blistering combination of funk and power gave a clue of what was yet to come.

Anyone who wondered as to whether or not all of Krakow's songs sounded the same got their question answered when the band moved into "Insomniac" from their latest release Minnesota. The song began with a country bluegrass feel and quickly moved into a spacey sound. Before the audience knew it, they were moved into a groovy rock number that had everybody up and dancing. Most of them did not sit down for the rest of the show.

Moving right into a Talking Head's cover, "Psycho Killer," the crowd seemed amazed with the relative ease of Krakow's transition from the 80's like 60's acid rock.

Soon, the band moved into "California Baby," a song getting some airplay on New Hampshire's Rock 101.1 and Boston's WBCN 104.1. The song makes you want to drive down the highway as too fast with the top down (if you have a convertible), or at least the windows down. Everybody was up and dancing and the band fed off their energy as Brian Chaffee, lead singer and keyboardist, belted out the line, "wanna change the world pick up a microphone."

Continuing with their multiple music personalities, Krakow then began a jazz song with Jay "Jesus" Barre walking his fingers up and down his six string bass with the greatest of ease.

On the next song, "A.L. Sausville," the drummer showed the crowd why he was the singer in his last band as he took over on lead vocals. The song led you down a hill and brought you on the climb back up. The crowd seemed focused on guitarist John Kleber's crafty guitar work as his fingers climbed the fretboard like it was a ladder.

After a lengthy intermission, the band returned and Chaffee had a chance to show off his funky rap abilities before moving into another style of song, reggae.

After moving through a couple of more songs, the band finished in a way that was representative of the whole show. The song was "Man Got You Down," and it made you feel that you were watching an educational video on types of music. The song began with a Latin feel and quickly moved into rap into soft rock into ambient and finally back into Latin. It eventually ended with a good old rock solo.

Krakow kept the crowd dancing and entertained for over two hours. Their style cannot be explained as they move so quickly. They will be playing every Wednesday night at the Hadley Pub on Route 9. For more information check out www.krakheads.org

A talk with the minds behind "Traffic"

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

America's war on drugs, our government's concerted effort to stamp out the importation and use of illegal substances, provides the political and social stomping grounds for the upcoming film Traffic starring Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones. Recently, the Collegian had the pleasure of talking with screenwriter Stephen Gaghan and producer Laura Bickford about working on the movie.

Gaghan began his career working in television, writing for "The Practice," "American Gothic" and "NYPD Blue," for which he earned an Emmy. "I learned a lot with TV, gained a lot of experience," he said about his years paying his dues as a teleplay writer, adding, "TV is very lucrative, but not very satisfying. I don't like it, don't like it at all. It was just a way to get a break."

About TV in general, he commented, "I'm just not a fan," noting that he hasn't even brought himself to watch his Emmy-winning episode on television.

The jump from television to the silver screen was a welcome change, then, and Gaghan found easy success with the action-thriller Rules of Engagement.

About his decision to write Traffic, he said, "The war on drugs seemed like a ripe topic for satire." After conducting extensive research, however, including visiting government think-tanks and interviewing high-ranking officials in the anti-drug effort, he had doubts about the appropriateness of satire. "I thought it wasn't fair to be Hollywood liberal on it."

"At the same time, I really disagreed with the policy," he said. "Nobody thought it was working [but] everybody's heart was in the right place." The result is a multifaceted exploration of the entire issue; Traffic follows four different storylines and includes 133 speaking parts. "We were very careful on not taking a position.

"I think that the beauty of drama is that you can make it real, you can make it truthful," he said, then adding, "You're trying to make entertainment. You want it to be fun. That takes priorities."

Traffic was shot with an "indie style," and despite its sweeping approach and politically charged subject matter, there was little difficulty in finding interested actors. "A lot of people wanted to work with [director] Steven [Soderbergh]," he said of the film's ability to attract such Hollywood names as Michael Douglas, Catherine Zeta-Jones and Dennis Quaid.

"I think that people wanted to be a part of something ambitious... It's very attractive to all artists. You want to make something good," he said.

Gaghan added about the film's ability to find financial backing (it was shot in ten different cities), "It's unusual that a movie like this could get made... It's not what you think about when you think about Hollywood."

About the movie's luminous stars, producer Laura Bickford said, "Michael and Catherine are amazing. Catherine was 6 months pregnant into the movie. For an actress to be pregnant and to be working as fast and as hard as she did is incredible."

The cast also includes newcomer Erica Christensen as a teenage drug addict. "We wanted to cast an unknown, someone whose face you haven't seen before. She's [amazing]," said Bickford about the young actress, who was chosen out of about 60 audition tapes.

Christensen plays the daughter of Douglas's character, the new anti-drug czar; other storylines follow a pair of undercover DEA agents working in the San Diego theatre of the drug war, a wealthy drug baron who finds his business taken over by his naive and pampered wife (Zeta-Jones), and a Mexican policeman who finds himself caught in a web of corruption.

The problems of sufficiently telling and intertwining these different stories resulted in a first cut of over three hours, which was eventually whittled down to 2:15.

Traffic will be in theaters nationwide on January 12.

Slim Shady Says! "There is a mandatory meeting tonight at 8:00p.m. in the Collegian office for all Arts' staff and writers." (Note: what Eminem actually said about tonight's Arts meeting had to be excessively cleaned up and changed into something non-offensive) If you have any questions, call Ryan Benharris at 5-1361.

Wailers to play UMASS

On Wednesday evening the legendary reggae group the Wailers will be performing at the UMASS Student Union Ballroom. The Wailers are a constantly changing group of talented musicians who carry on the spirit and music of Bob Marley. The current line-up is made up of Aston "Familyman" Barrett on the bass, Al Anderson on guitar, Earl Lindo on organs, Ian Burrell on keyboards, Gary "Nesta" Pine with lead vocals and a smattering of backup singers and percussionists.

After Bob Marley's death in 1981, the original Wailers dispanded as the band including reggae-superstar Peter Tosh and Bunny Wailer went there separate ways. There have been a number of solo projects by Tosh as well as by Bunny and Marley's son Ziggy. These performers have added to the recent resurgence of reggae back into mainstream music. Prior to Bob Marley and the Wailers, reggae was almost unknown outside of the Carribean. Without the Wailers, the entire music world as we know it would be different.

Opening for the Wailers is Boston-based Pressure Cooker. They bring a very upbeat reggae sound that is sure to start the evening off with excitement. Local Reggae artist Mentos will also be performing his well known drums as you may have seen him around Amherst and Northampton. The UMASS dance team, The Funk Club will also be performing between acts.

If you are in the mood to hear some finey new reggae or some classics from the Marley catalogue, make your way over to the Student Union. The doors are open at 7 with the music starting at 8pm. It certainly is not going to cost you a lot, as tickets are $5 for UMASS students and $7 for the general public. Last year, this same band played in Northampton for almost four times the ticket price. Take advantage of them playing in our own backyard and enjoy some great music.

Bob Moses LP mellow, drummer-centered jazz

By Joe Cardoza
Collegian Correspondent

BOB MOSES
Nishoma
Grapeshot Records

Bob Moses has, for a long time, been rightfully recognized as one of the finest drummers in the jazz world. His comfortable blend of traditional swing styles with Latin beats and African polyrhythms gives him the ability to at once lead a group and serve as an accompaniment. Jaco Pastorius said, "The greatest melodic drummer in the world is Bob Moses."

He may be best known for his work with Pat Metheny and Pastorius, but over time, he has established himself as a talented composer and bandleader with five albums under his belt. His latest release, Nishoma, is his first in over five years. The title, which means "Beautiful Soul," refers to Moses' mother, Greta Moses, who died in 1997. This collection of ballads fuses Moses' melodic sensibilities with a cast of varied but superb players to create a smooth, relaxing feel.

The album features Chris Wood of Medeski, Martin, and Wood fame, showing his mellow side (It is interesting to note that Bob Moses introduced the three to each other, apparently recognizing their potential compatibility). The album also features Steve Kuhn on piano whose melodic playing, especially on "Greta's Last Journey" provides a perfect foundation for the ensemble. Jimmy Slyde's tap dancing skills are beautifully molded with Moses arrangements on "Caravan to the Stars" and "Ask Me Now," a Thelonius Monk composition. The highlights of the album are "Lagrimas de Alegria," the opening track, and "Moondew," composed by Jovino Santos Neto. "Lagrimas" is one of the more upbeat selections on the album, combining Moses' swing feel with Wood's bossa bass lines. Both songs feature the beautiful vocals of Luciano Souza. She is also featured on track 2, "Visit With the Great Spirit/El Visionario." The last track on the album is the famous Irving Berlin song, "How Deep is the Ocean," and it features Abbey Lincoln on vocals, as well as a beautiful piano solo from Kuhn.

For those who are interested in seeing Moses unleash his full chops, be forewarned—this album is very laid back, with Moses demonstrating his composing ability, rather than his stick work. The result is not without its merits. Though the album may not encourage frenzied dancing and features no real virtuostic displays, it is a smooth album that is worth a listen, especially when you just want to sit back, relax and feel good.

half, Oregon center Julius Hicks took an inbounds pass and laid it into the hoop while Williams was daydreaming with his back to the basket.

The Minutemen were able to close the gap to 50-40 at the half, however, when the Ducks committed a horrible defensive play by fouling Mack while he was shooting a three with 0.7 seconds left. The UMass sharpshooter then drilled all three freebies, as he was the only Massachusetts player who was able to deliver from the line with any consistency, going 11-for-14 on the game.

"I was just taking my time and taking what they gave me," Mack said. "As far as my shooting, I had been spending a lot of time in the gym lately."

Besides Mack, the other bright spot for the Maroon and White was Brand. He was able to score 19 points on the game on 6-for-8 shooting and was the beneficiary of an assortment of good passes from guard Shannon Crooks. Brand also was able to haul down a team-high nine rebounds.

"I just went out, played hard, played aggressive, and tired to make things happen," Brand said.

In the second half, Mack was unable to continue his hot hand and only scored a single field goal in that frame, for a grand total of 26 points. Throughout the last 20 minutes of the game, Mack was unable to get any good looks at the basket, and really wasn't even involved in the offense.

"We felt the key guys in the game were Crooks and Mack," Kent said. "We made some adjustments at half-time, and in the second half the reason they were able to score inside was because we had to do some things to lock up Mack."

Without Mack carrying the bulk of the offensive load, the Minutemen were forced to jump on Brand's shoulders and hope that he could carry the team by himself. This was a monumental task to ask of a player that was not used to carrying the bulk of the offensive load, and the Ducks gradually pulled away toward their 15-point victory.

By defeating UMass, Oregon was able to improve to 5-0 on the season and will have a nice layover before it heads back to its home court for a Dec. 12 clash with Illinois-Chicago.

The Maroon and White, on the other hand, fell to 1-3 with the loss, and will be back in action Thursday when it hosts Providence. This will be a pivotal game for the team, considering that the road ahead will not be easy, as UConn, Ohio State, Boston College and North Carolina are all making appearances on the Minuteman schedule in the near future.

Rogers was whistled for an intentional foul for allegedly tripping the Oregon forward, who canned both his foul shots. Then, before the Ducks could even inbound the ball on the ensuing possession, UMass' Eric Williams was tagged with a technical for elbowing Norwood.

"I don't understand why they called a technical on a dead ball," Flint said. "The referee that called it was talking to me when it happened. At first I thought he called it on me."

Two more free throws and a Jones jumper later, the Oregon lead was 64-52. The plays didn't get any cleaner, and the end result didn't bode well for the visitors' immediate roundball future.

"A lot of fouls are going to be called out there until the officials settle down, much like we need to settle down, and get used to the new style of play," Kent said.

Adam White is a Collegian columnist.

Foul play dooms traveling UMass hoopsters

Team drops to 1-3; Providence up next

Free throws end up costly

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

PORTLAND – In the quiet city of Portland, where cleanliness is the norm and crime is low, the Oregon Ducks played against their city's image by trashing the Massachusetts men's basketball team 91-76 at the Rose Garden last Saturday night by a score of 91-76.

It was the usual game for the Minutemen, in which they seemed unable to hit a free throw, going 23-for-37 in the contest, were completely out rebounded by a smaller team 34-to-26, and made enough mental and physical mistakes to bury themselves against the Ducks.

Oregon, on the other hand, took advantage of the fact that the referees were whistle happy by drilling 15 of 46 free throw attempts, amongst the 39 total fouls called throughout the contest.

"It is frustrating," UMass Head Coach James Bruiser Flint said. "I thought we played pretty well, but on the road you can't turn the ball over and miss free throws."

Despite the fact that the Marcott and White did not play the way it is capable of playing, it took a monumental turn of events to really turn the tide toward the Ducks and end any reasonable chance of a Minutemen comeback.

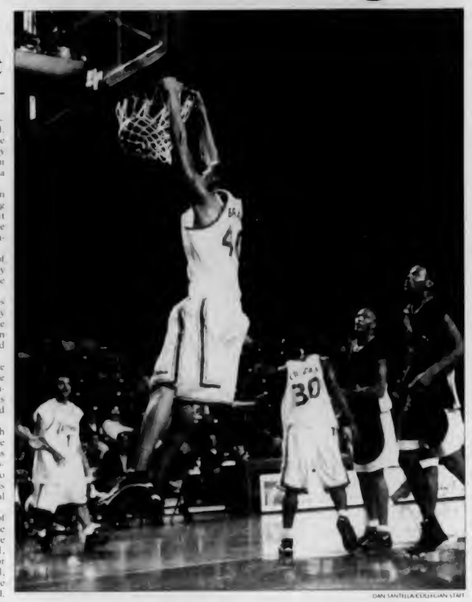
Midway through the second frame, Micah Brand drilled a pair of shots from the line to close the gap to 36-32 after UMass had been down by as many as 13 in the first half. On the ensuing possession however, Oregon was able to get a score to push the lead back up to six, and a few seconds later Jackie Rogers was called for an intentional foul by slapping Ducks forward Frederick Jones.

Jones was able to hit both free throws for two of the 23 points he would muster on the night. The contest, however, did not end there, though. Before Oregon could even throw in the ball, Massachusetts' forward Eric Williams was called for a technical foul for elbowing Anthony Norwood, who then also was able to swish a pair from the line. This time when the Ducks inbounded the ball, Jones took a mid-range jumper to push the lead to 12.

Even though the Minutemen eventually closed the gap to 67-62 a few minutes later, they were unable to get any closer, and the two consecutive technicals for all intent and purposes, ended any hope of a UMass comeback.

"When we got that technical it was really tough," Flint said. "I don't understand why they called the (second) technical. I (wrote was) just walking to the line. We never (spoke) from there."

While the second half was tough for both teams, the first half had a much better flow to it. The Minutemen fell behind early, but were able to come back when Monty Mack reverted to the form that made him the favorite for Atlantic 10 player of the year.



DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN STAFF

UMass power forward Micah Brand goes up for a rim-rattling dunk. Against Oregon he was able to amass 19 points to go along with nine boards.

In the early going, he drilled a step-back three from the left elbow in the face of Oregon defender Luke Ridnour and on the next possession, swished one from the same spot. Later on in the half, he canned another long-range bomb from behind the arc, on his way to picking up 20 first half points.

"At times we couldn't guard Mack even though we knew exactly where he was going to be on the floor," Ducks Head Coach Ernie Kent said.

Midway through the first half, Oregon began to pull away from the Maroon and White when the entire UMass frontcourt got into foul trouble. Rogers, Williams, Brand and Kitwana Rhymer all picked up two quick fouls, forcing the Minutemen to go with an incredibly small lineup. This allowed Jones and Bryan Braces (a career high 24 points on the evening) to slash through the Minuteman defense at will.

Of course, it was not only good offensive play by the Ducks that allowed them to score 50 points in the first frame. With the Oregon lead at seven, Bracey took an entry pass at the baseline and promptly spun by the lead-footed Rotell Blizzard like he was standing still – which he was. Later on in the

But the run-and-gun Ducks began winning the war of the whistle shortly thereafter, attacking the plodding UMass defense and getting calls seemingly at will.

"We talked all day yesterday, today and even at halftime about how the rule changes benefit our team," Oregon coach Ernie Kent said. "UMass is a half court slugfest team, that uses a more east coast physical style of play. We're a running team, so it puts us at an advantage."

None seemed happier to fly by the Minutemen than Bracey, who stuck 6-of-8 freebies en route to a career-high 24 points. Bracey staked his team to its first double-digit lead, 43-33, by blasting past UMass' Ronell Blizzard on the right baseline for an easy layup and foul.

ADAM WHITE

Oregon's Frederick Jones was equally effective at capitalizing on the new rules, missing only once In 10 trips to the stripe while amassing 25 points.

"They're going to call it like that all year," Jones said. "If you want to be a good team, you're just going to have to adapt."

UMass had its share of difficulty on the other end of the floor as well, as its players would often get great positioning inside but fail to convert their chances. Brand had the paint all to himself on a second-half feed from Crooks, but went up in slow motion allowing Duck guard Anthony Norwood to collapse on him and commit the foul.

Brand subsequently missed both free throws.

The sophomore pivot had a chance for redemption less than two minutes later, when he spun to the hoop with defender Flo Hartenstein completely out of position on his left shoulder. But Brand's dunk attempt rattled harmlessly out, and a Hartensten hack became a mere footnote when Brand again bricked his two foul shots.

"If you're playing us, that's what you do," Flint said. "You don't let guys get the two, you just hack them. You let them beat themselves."

The biggest calls of the night came with 9:54 to go in the game and UMass trailing 58-52. Jones fell flat on a Duck breakaway and

NFL: no future for losers

4th and inches
with Adam White

Let's start first a few words for our death deprived Norv Turner. He was a straight shooter at a very knowledgeable football pro, and an excellent coach. His failure in D.C. could mostly be blamed on that sorry assed list lump a bunch of talent together and expect it to get into a winner.

I specially like the best games of most of their mediocrities are behind them. Deion Sanders doesn't even trash talk anymore for God's sake! The Skins had all the ingredients for a letdown; they are too old, they have no chemistry and they had a quarterback controversy essentially since week two. So by surprise they will be watching the playoffs from there sofas.

But enough about the dead, on with the living.

Minnesota is without a doubt, the frontrunner here at the Week 15 mark. After handling the pesky Lions on Thursday night Denny Green's crew owns the best record in football and all the momentum heading down the stretch.

Somehow tailback Robert Smith has stayed healthy for the first time in his career, leading the Viking rushing attack to consistent heights that only tasted sporadically in years past. Quarterback Daunte Culpepper boasts on the cover of the latest Sports Illustrated that he wants to be the best ever. Cris Carter hustled in his 1,000th career catch against Detroit bringing further accolades to a receiving corps that is looking more and more like the best of all time.

Speaking of Carter, did you know that he might never have caught a single NFL pass were it not for UMass sport management professor Glenn Wong? It's a story for another time, but ask Professor Wong about it.

Back to the gridiron: the rest of the NFC's best remind me of Rocky and Apollo at the end of Rocky II, trying to get to their feet before the bell rings and they are counted out. The Giants have seemingly written their own ticket by taking the Eagles, but how far can star rookie Kerry Collins once teams start playing for keeps?

The Tuna himself said during his glory days in the Meadowlands that you can't win it all if you can't control the football, and I don't see teams having to reinvent the wheel to stop Tiki Barber and Ron Dayne.

Philadelphia could ruffle some feathers in the second season. Despite getting hooted by artifact Al Del Greco and the Titans on Sunday, the Eagles have put together nine wins and look like the best of the wild card candidates.

Donovan McNabb? Poor man's Culpepper, plain and simple.

As far as the NFC West goes: hey, somebody's gotta win it. The Rams were supposed to be bolstered by the return of Kurt Warner, but instead looked anemic in putting up a lonely field goal against less-than-stellar Carolina.

Most fans wrote New Orleans off with the loss of Ricky Williams and Jeff Blake, but the Saints have played surprisingly well since being bitten by the injury bug. Despite losing to Denver Sunday, N.O. fans enjoyed a jaw-dropping performance from QB Aaron Brooks (441 yards, two touchdowns). That's what happens when you run the ball a whole nine times.

Over in the AFC, three squads with 10-3 marks look to play demolition derbi once the playoffs get under way. Miami will most likely cork out first, as neither half of the Dolphins' two-headed QB monster has looked better than average thus far. This defense definitely deserves better than Jay Fiedler and Damon Huard.

The aforementioned Titans have all the tools to make it back to the big game, and have handled a pretty stiff schedule this season (their losses are to Buffalo, Jacksonville and the Ravens). Then again, playing Cleveland twice will do wonders for anyone's record.

If Eddie George can withstand the spotlight, he will end up on that elite tailback plateau with Jim Brown and Walter Payton. He's that good, and more marketable than both those other greats; sadly that's half of what gets you there these days.

Oakland looked like a thoroughbred going into its clash with the Steelers, but couldn't put Pittsburgh away and ended up losing by one, 21-20. That doesn't tell a good story for Rich Gannon and company come playoff time, when leads become twice as valuable and deficits twice as tough to overcome.

Does anybody remember this tight end, Rickey Dudley, who looked like such a dangerous offensive weapon for the Raiders last year? If anybody knows where he's hiding this season, they should tell him to come join the party before it's too late.

Heisman hopefuls compete for trophy

Running the option with Matthew F. Sacco

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

The Downtown Athletic Club cordially invites Drew Brees, Josh Heupel, Chris Weinke and Ladainian Tomlinson to the annual Heisman Trophy presentation for the best player in college football.

Eric Crouch: snubbed.

The four finalists for collegiate athletics most prestigious award were announced today and one significant name was omitted from the list, that name being Crouch.

Crouch quarterbacked Nebraska to a 9-2 record with a plethora of gaudy statistics that should arguably make him a candidate for the sacred award.

The junior was a force on the ground as well as in the air, as he amassed 2,07[illegible]4 yards from scrimmage. He also led the Big XII in points with 20 rushing touchdowns, while also finding the endzone 11 times through the air.

What may have dissuaded the voters from putting Crouch on the list is his relative lack of production in the vertical passing game as compared to the other three candidates at his position. Crouch posted a very unimpressive 1,101 yards through the air while completing only 48.1 percent of his passes. He had only 156 pass attempts on the year and was still picked off seven times.

These less than outstanding numbers probably did not appeal to voters who are more accustomed to a more prototypical passer such as Weinke, Heupel or Brees.

The only running back on the list was Texas Christian's Ladainian Tomlinson. Tomlinson ran roughshod over 11 different defenses this year en route to TCU's 10-1 record. He carried the ball 369 times for 2,158 yards. His 5.8 yards per carry is astounding as is the 22 rushing touchdowns he scored.

What will hurt Tomlinson in the Heisman race however, is his one-dimensional game. He caught only 10 passes for the horned frogs all year, amassing 40 yards and zero endzone dances. His numbers are large, especially when compared to other backs, but Tomlinson won't win the award because he is being compared to quarterbacks, not running backs.

Brees is one of three quarterbacks contending for this years Heisman. The Purdue QB led the Boilermakers to a Big Ten title and a Rose Bowl hid against Washington.

As one of the preseason favorites for the award Brees did not disappoint by tossing for 3,393 yards and 24 TD's. He is easily the most complete player of the three quarterbacks nominated as he also ran for 546 yards and five touchdowns.

If Weinke's passing numbers weren't so far ahead of the competition than Brees might be the favorite. Since he has virtually the same passing stats as Heupel and better rushing numbers, he should get the nod over the Oklahoma signal caller.

Heupel did however put up solid numbers on an undefeated Sooner squad. Like Brees he threw for over 3,000 yards and 20 touchdowns but his 14 interceptions are too high for a player of the year. Heupel was also fairly effective on the ground with seven TD's.

Heupel's only chance is that the committee heavily weighs OU's unblemished record. If they don't than Brees or Weinke gets the nod.

Unfortunately for the other Heisman hopefuls, the only person leaving New York City with a miniature football statue is from Tallahassee.

Weinke's numbers are far and away better than any other player in division I football. His 4,167 yards passing is over 700 yards better than that of Brees and Heupel and his 33 TD's are nine more than the closest contender. He has less interceptions, 11, than any other candidate and similar to the other hopefuls, his completion percentage is in the 60's.

Weinke is the clear-cut favorite not only because of his superior statistics, but because he has everything going for him with the exception of a nonexistent running game. Weinke may not be the most versatile of players, but he plays for a championship contender in a high profile market and he should get it because he is 2b and still in college.

Decision looms; SGA waits

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Unable to make quorum last Wednesday, the Student Government Association looked to address the issues surrounding tonight's senate meeting.

With tensions still running high amongst SGA members over the yet to be decided Judiciary case, the likelihood of Senate productivity has come into question.

Although claims have been made that members have been able to continue working, many councils would be dismantled if the Senate were to be ruled unconstitutional by the Judiciary.

The Finance Committee, headed by Chair Jeff Bazydlo, is just one of many committees that will be unable to continue if the body is ruled unconstitutional.

"The Finance Committee will be affected due to the fact that they are unable to allocate money and cannot meet unofficially," Speaker Jim Eltringham said. "The Administrative Affairs committee is another group who could be affected by the outcome of the case."

The overall productivity of these groups has been brought into question; however, many have claimed that the case has not been an issue within the workings of their committees.

"We've made quorum almost every time and have been allocating funds on a regular basis," Bazydlo said. "Since this semester has begun, we have allocated over $6,000, and hopefully well get more applications requesting funding."

Bazydlo continued to add that although they have been allocating funds this past week, he has seen a surprising slow down of applications for funding. Although the Finance is just one of many committees, it was the first one to publicly acknowledge a change in the overall productivity of the group.

Tonight's meeting will be and last week's meeting was "a wake-up call. We feel that everybody counts," Eltringham said.

Firefighters demonstrate lamp danger

By Suzanne Furst
Collegian Staff

Many University of Massachusetts students have fire hazards in their rooms and have no idea. In an effort to notify these residents, the Amherst Fire Department, Energy Star and Western Massachusetts Electric joined together in the Student Union circle yesterday at 11 a.m. to demonstrate the danger of halogen lamps.

The demonstration showed clothing being ignited in flames in under one minute when place on top of the halogen lamp by an Amherst firefighter. He later used the lamp to fry eggs and disintegrate a rag. The temperature reached the point where one could boil water.

Since 1992, according to the Consumer Product Safety Commission, halogen lighting has nationally been the cause of 930 fires, 36 deaths and 138 injuries. There have been two major fires caused on the UMass Amherst campus within the last two semesters. Each of the two incidents took place in the Southwest residential area.

Michael Swain, Campus Fire Prevention Officer, was present at the demonstration and explained the problems that he has experienced on campus. One accident occurred when a poster fell onto the lamp eventually causing it to ignite on fire. The second fire took place during a blackout. A male student draped his damp laundry during the power outage, and when power was restored, the clothes caught fire with him asleep in the room. Swain cautioned that halogen lighting does pose a threat.

It is because of fires such as the ones here at UMass, that two thirds of colleges and universities in the United States have banned halogen torchieres. Nevertheless, there are about fifty million halogen floor lamps currently used in the country.

Aprille Soderman, Senior Representative for Energy Star, Western Massachusetts Electric spoke about the benefits of Energy Star. For example, there is less electricity used (55 vs. 500 watts), and it won't overload circuit systems. Also, Energy Star-rated torchieres save more than $250 in electrical bills during the life of the lamp.

UM controversy develops around GEO contracts

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

A recent contract agreement signed by the University of Massachusetts and the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) has caused a spark of controversy among the graduate student community.

Russell Hamlin, a graduate student in the Plant and Soil Sciences department, recently voiced a complaint to GEO that he has been slighted about $400 in retroactive pay. According to the agreement, graduate students were to be paid retroactive compensation for the raises, which were not implemented into their paycheck from Sept. 5, 1999 through Aug. 2000.

According to Hamlin, the entire situation turned out to be quite perplexing for many graduate students.

"By their own admission, it's very confusing, and one of the things that I've wondered is whether people know if they got shorted," he said. "It's so hard to determine what you should have gotten in the first place."

Hamlin, who went from being a teaching assistant, to a research assistant and back to a teaching assistant, claims that the problem appears when you compare the paychecks of graduate students who held the two different jobs.

"For my understanding," he said, "the only retroactive pay I got was for when I was a teaching assistant."

James A.W. Shaw, the Grievance Coordinator and former President of GEO, acknowledged that something has definitely gone wrong.

He explained, "We feel that the University has broken the contract and defied a significant number of people."

Hamlin thinks that there was a problem equalizing the pay of a teaching assistant and research assistant.

"Regardless of whether you were a TA, you got the money, but if some point when you swapped over and become an RA [Research Assistant], you may not have gotten a lot of the money," he said.

Shaw pointed out that the funding for teaching assistants and research assistants is different. Teaching assistants are funded by the state, and research assistants are funded by national funding industries.

He also explained that the retroactive pay was unquestionably not only for certain graduate students, but was supposed to have encompassed everyone.

"Everyone was eligible, regardless of the funding source. There are obviously rules though," Shaw said. "People get a flat rate based on the number of hours that you worked. The only trick is that you had to be on the payroll as of September 5, 1999." He said that this date encompasses the majority of graduate students.

Hamlin questioned the trust graduate students are placing in GEO and its responsibility to represent him.

"They take a certain portion of your paycheck every week as dues and you become a member. They promised and informed people that raises were going to be given. They continuously promised and gave us the status that the raises are coming, and they're not here," he said. "They made their promises and I don't have my retroactive pay, and as the organization that represents me and is responsible for taking over all the process where they sequestered this money, they are responsible for not delivering."

Shaw's argument is that the University made a few major mistakes.

"The University claimed that they paid the grant funded employees in advance," he said. "We asked them for a list of people and how much they got, and the University is refusing. That is making this difficult for us to investigate grievances."

Florida Court to hear Gore

By Chris Thompson
Collegian Staff

See Student Response Inside

The Florida Supreme Court announced yesterday that they would hear arguments for Al Gore's contest of the election certification in Florida on Thursday morning.

Florida Supreme Court spokesman Craig Waters said yesterday that the Court's members are aware of the "great public importance" of the case and its need for resolution "immediately."

Any ruling by the Court could run up against the Dec. 12 deadline for the naming of electors. If the Court rules in Gore's favor granting full manual recounts in Palm Beach and Miami-Dade counties, it is uncertain whether or not they would have time to complete their counts before the deadline.

Waters indicated that the Court had not yet decided to hear the case, and would make that decision after hearing each sides half-hour long argument.

Gore's legal team appealed the case to the high court after Leon County Circuit Court Judge N. Sanders Sauls ruled that Gore's Florida election contest lacked merit. In his ruling, Sauls said that Gore's lawyers failed to prove that the results of the election would be different if manual recounts in the two south Florida counties went forward.

"We've said from the beginning that we think it's very important for the votes that were cast actually to be counted. And what we are going to do — and we have filed this afternoon an appeal to the District Court of Appeals with a request that it be certified as a matter of great public importance and urgency to the Florida Supreme Court," said lead Gore attorney David Boies after Sauls' decision.

At issue is the votes of Florida's 25 electors, whose allegiance remains in doubt more than four weeks after the presidential election. The winner of Florida's electoral votes will become the nation's 43rd President, succeeding Bill Clinton.

A recent NBC news poll shows that the number of Americans wanting Al Gore to concede the election has increased in the past week. After Sauls' court decision, 59 percent of people surveyed said that they believed Gore should concede the election. That figure was a 10 percent jump over when the question was last posed a week ago.

Gore made another television appearance yesterday afternoon, saying he felt "nothing but optimistic" about his chances in Florida.

"The effort I have under way is simply to make sure that all the votes are counted," he said.

Attorney's representing Gore and George W. Bush presented written arguments to the Florida Supreme Court yesterday regarding the U.S. Supreme Court's ordering of the Florida court to review its decision in extending the state certification deadline.

On Monday, the United States Supreme Court ordered the Florida court to review its decision, claiming confusion over the legal source of its decision.

"After reviewing the opinion of the Florida Supreme Court, we find that there is considerable uncertainty as to the precise grounds for the decision," the Court's decision said.

The Florida Court extended the certification deadline in Florida to allow for manual recounts. In several counties. The Court cited a Florida law mandating manual recounts in close elections in its decision to extend the deadline.

Cop attacked during melee

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department made a series of arrests this weekend ranging from suspicious person activity to breaking and entering.

On Friday at roughly 11:45 p.m., Joseph Milbury, 19, of Sharon was arrested for breaking and entering and burglary in Washington Dormitory. Barbara O'Connor, Deputy Chief of the UMPD explained that Milbury was not from the University and was up visiting someone in Kennedy Dormitory. While he was there she explained, "He was aggressive and belligerent to those present."

She explained that he then moved on the Washington Dormitory where he broke a door down and destroyed property within the room.

"This situation involved an ex-boyfriend," O'Connor explained. "He entered his ex-girlfriend's room and destroyed some of her personal property."

He destroyed her computer and was arrested for malicious destruction of property with over $250 worth of damage, and nighttime breaking and entering.

Another arrest occurred on Saturday when 20-year-old Timothy Koerner of Methuen was arrested for disorderly conduct in Lot 11. Officers monitoring the lot spotted him looking into cars, when they asked for his identification he tried to flee the area and officers pursued him on foot.

"He resisted their efforts to make a field investigation," O'Connor said. "This was a good piece of preventative police work."

An additional incident that occurred in a parking lot, took place on Sunday at nearly 3:00 a.m., when police officers noticed 19-year-old Brendan Meade of Lowell walking through lot 32 kicking motor vehicles parked in the area. He was carrying a red cup that contained beer and was arrested for disorderly conduct and two counts of wanton destruction of property causing over $250 worth of damage.

Police were called to John Quincy Adams Dormitory to investigate an individual that was creating a disturbance and threatening to kill someone. Officers arrested 19-year-old Thomas Pine of Bristol, Rhode Island for breaking and entering, possession of a class D substance and assault and battery. O'Connor explained that the individual broke into a dormitory room and hit an individual on the side of the face.

"He entered the room uninvited and refused to leave," O'Connor said.

The residents of the dormitory room forced Pine to leave, but he continued to stand outside kicking the door until police arrived to arrest him.

A medical emergency call came in on Thursday for the police that turned into something much more serious. The UMPD received a complaint from a resident assistant in Baker Dormitory of a resident threatening to kill someone in the hall and creating a disturbance.

O'Connor explained that police arrived and that it took four officers to subdue the individual and then to call an ambulance for what seemed like a negative drug reaction. While police officers were responding to the call, the individual became combative both punching and kicking a police officer. He was finally taken to the hospital and will be charged with assault and battery at a later date.

Butterfield busted during drug raid

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

A semester-long investigation resulted in four drug related arrests in Butterfield Dormitory when police officers from the University of Massachusetts Police Department seized a variety of different narcotics.

According to Deputy Chief Barbara O'Connor of the UMPD, members of the state police department, the narcotics department and the campus police entered the dormitory on Friday morning at 10 a.m. and served several students with search warrants.

"This was following a long investigation into drug activity in the dormitory," O'Connor said. "It was the culmination of an investigation by a narcotics officer."

The police arrested Sean Brendan Ryel, 20, of Holyoke for possession of a class D substance, possession with an intent to distribute, resisting arrest and assault and battery on a police officer.

O'Connor explained that Ryel kicked an officer in the leg in an attempt to resist arrest and was very belligerent towards him. The altercation caused the officer serious injury that has resulted in his being out of work since the incident.

The second person arrested was Michael Cook, 21, of Middleboro for possession of a class D substance with intent to distribute, possession of a class C substance, and for carrying a dangerous weapon. He was found to be carrying both Vicaden and a knife.

"It is illegal to possess a double-edged knife so he was arrested," O'Connor explained.

Peter Olsen, 20, of Douglas was arrested for possession of marijuana and Cory Scott Howard was arrested for possession of Vicaden, marijuana and Ketamine.

Ketamine, which is a class C substance, is used commonly used as a veterinary anesthetic. Some of its visual effects are similar to LSD and can cause memory loss; overdose could result in death. While Vicaden is a class A substance that is a prescription pain killer, the drug is most often used after surgery and is also fairly strong.

O'Conner explained that the UMPD called in outside help because of the possibility that they might be dealing with designer drugs that were, "out of the realm of a normal police officer's understanding."

She could not speculate on whether or not the four arrested knew each other or whether or not they were related.

RYAN BENHARRIS/COLLEGIAN
Russell Hamlin's paycheck shows earnings of $222.48, $400 less than what he was expecting.

Shaw added, "You go through a different amount of contracts during the year. The University gave a flat rate to anyone they were supposed to, but if you had a contract after September 5, 1999, they denied you the raise." He noted that this is unfortunate and, "just because people's paperwork gets processed late doesn't mean they shouldn't get their raise."

As for the matter of graduate students being informed about contract negotiations and the ramifications of an outcome, both parties agreed that the students had access to that knowledge. Shaw said that emails were sent out to all graduates students about the progression of negotiations throughout the year-long process.

Hamlin did make it a point to note that he had the opportunity to become well informed, but chose not to involve himself.

"I was informed the negations were going on as a graduate student. I have the right to be as involved or not involved in the process as I choose to be and still be represented by GEO and obtain all of the things that they do for all their members," he said.

"As far as I know, this process was going on, and the contract negations were going on, but I never went to a meeting where they talked about the process."

Shaw was very assured that if there is a problem with people getting their money, it must be taken care of. He noted that grievances could ultimately go to arbitration.

"If we don't get the satisfaction that we deserve, we will take this case as far as it can be taken," Shaw said.

Hamilln was not so sure that issues would be handled properly.

"There's a difference between what GEO says is the problem and what the administration says is the problem," Hamlin explained, "but as a graduate student, the blame lies with the people that represent me if business doesn't get conducted."

Students urge Gore to concede election

By Chris Thompson
Collegian Staff

Mirroring national opinion, many students at the University of Massachusetts believe that despite the ongoing litigation in Florida, George W. Bush won the presidency and that Al Gore should concede the election.

With new Gallup polling data finding that 58 percent of Americans say Gore should concede, many UMass students agreed, saying that Gore should concede for the good of the nation.

"I think the election is too close to call, but I think Gore should concede," Jason Malstrom, a senior Communications major who voted for Libertarian candidate Harry Browne, said. "If Gore continues what he's doing he'll destroy the country and his party."

Vanessa Dube, a junior Math major and Bush voter, said that Bush won the election that Gore was presently trying to steal.

"It seems to me that this is a case of them [the Gore team] not liking the candidate who won, so they call for recount after recount until the result is overturned," Dube said.

Many Gore supporters, however, believe that Gore won the election and that he should continue his legal challenge to the results of the presidential election in Florida.

"Gore did win the popular vote," Michael Donne, a senior Communications major and a Gore voter, said. "I'm more concerned with all the votes being counted, if Bush wins so be it."

Other Gore voters were quick to point out that the Vice-President leads Bush in the popular vote.

"I think Gore won because he got the popular vote and it also seems that he should've gotten Florida if it weren't for the Jews for Buchanan in Palm Beach," said Michael Whitehouse, a junior economics major, referring to the confusing ballot in Palm Beach County, which many residents claim caused them to cast their votes for reform party candidate Pat Buchanan when they intended to vote for Gore.

Whitehouse added, "If the people had to chose only between Bush and Gore, Gore would've attracted enough Nader votes to win the state as well."

Graduate student Mary Robinson agreed. "Across the country Gore won the election, but in Florida no one will ever know."

Gore leads Bush in the popular vote, 50,158,094 to 49,820,518, a margin of more than 300,000 votes.

Sophomore Chelsea Sullivan expressed disdain for the Electoral College.

"I don't feel like my vote counts," Sullivan said. "I feel like my vote has been taken away by the Electoral College."

The Electoral College is scheduled to meet on Dec. 18 to elect the next President. Gore presently has the support of 267 electors to Bush's 246. Neither candidate can reach the requisite 270 votes to assume the presidency without the backing of Florida's 25 electors.

ignites fires because it reaches temperatures of 1100 degrees Fahrenheit. Energy Star's does not exceed 200 degrees. In fact, 90 percent of the electricity used to power a halogen lamp is wasted as heat.

"The Energy Star rated torchieres that the students will be given in exchange for their old halogen models - use 75 percent less energy, last ten times longer. The lamps that last 10,000 hours, which means that every student to make the exchange for an Energy Star rated torchiere over the life of the lamp, will save a barrel of oil, 2100 pounds of coal and reduce 82 pounds of acid rain," Soderman explained. That's pretty remarkable. WMECO is very proud to be sponsoring this event at UMass."

Mrs. Soderman added, "If everyone switched over to Energy Star fixtures, it would be the equivalent of taking 17 million cars off the road.

This figure is just for lighting, it doesn't include the fact that Energy Star is in other items such as computers. A switchover could also save 9 billion kilowatt hours and prevent the emission of 11 million tons of carbon dioxide every year.

The program, called the "Great Northeast ENERGY STAR Torchiere Turn-in" will allow students living on-campus to turn in their halogen torchieres for safer ones from Energy Star on campus on Dec. 12-13 from 3-7 p.m. The students can bring their halogen torchieres to Hampden Dining Hall, the basement lounge of Johnson, the first floor lounge of Baker, room 109 of Grayson or the first floor lounge of Brown.

In addition any students living off campus or any customers of Western Massachusetts Electric can participate in the turn-in at the Hampshire Mall. They can do so Dec. 7-10 from 10 a.m. to 10 p.m.

The halogen and the compact fluorescent lamps provide the same amount of lighting and look alike, but their differences in energy efficiency are astounding.

Coverage: Fair not nice

On this very page, there is a letter written by Lauren Bulkeley about an article written by one of our employees about the University of Massachusetts Swimming and Diving teams. In it, she not only points out some mistakes that we made, but also betrays her feelings that "regardless of a win or a loss, please show us ... support."

It is not our responsibility to show support, nor is it our responsibility to simply lavish attention upon an organization, a team, a group or an event simply because it involves students. This is something that not only frustrates our tireless workers, but is a lesson that just hasn't been learned by the University of Massachusetts.

For her part, Bulkeley points out what she calls "sarcasm" and "rude remarks" in the article as evidence that the Collegian wasn't as supportive as we supposedly should have been. But what she calls sarcastic and rude, we call fact. She declares that our reference to Syracuse as the "clearly superior squad" is biased; we refute that, as Syracuse won by 110 points, nearly doubling the Massachusetts team score. That is superiority. Further, in such a loss, there are few bright spots for a team that gets beaten so badly.

But Bulkeley isn't the issue so much as the message behind what she says. She, like so many UMass students, seems to think that the Collegian's responsibility on this campus is to be free positive press for all students and, in the same vein, never to point out the negative things in which students have been involved.

Student from Butterfield have told us that they are good kids and hence, when there are drug busts in their dorm, it should not concern us as a newspaper. But the very issue is that it should concern us because a crime was committed – hence news. We should not be expected to turn our heads simply because students have made a mistake, especially one as egregious as being arrested for drug use or possession.

Our own Student Government Association has repeatedly said that people on this campus wouldn't think poorly of them if we wouldn't write negative things about them. Get real. Should we simply ignore the fact that their constant bickering is threatening funding for all campus clubs, as well as perhaps the greatest single vehicle for the student voice to be heard? Of course we shouldn't. Not only would we compromise our integrity by doing so, but also we would become pawns of our own government.

Media's responsibility is to be honest at all times, and perhaps, to be so bold, to be critical of society when critique is needed. We feel that that we are doing a good job when it comes to those responsibilities, but the fact of the matter is that, to do a good job, our main focus cannot be being "nice."

As such, when the Swimming and Diving teams get soundly and roundly beaten, we have to write about that.

When students are arrested, we have to write about that.

When our SGA threatens the well being of programming, clubs and the student voice on campus, we have to write about that.

Our job isn't to praise or to pet, it is to be honest. Honesty hurts, that's for sure, but what are we if aren't an honest news organization?

A joke. And that's something we just aren't comfortable with.

If you are interested in writing for Ed/Op, come down and see Rob Schulze NOW!!!!!

Towing the line

DANA OPPEDISANO

Hey there! Now, I should start by telling all of you loyal Collegian readers that this week we have decided to try something different. You see that little picture of Dana Oppedisano beside this column? Well, he hasn't actually written what you are reading right now. Oh, I'm sorry, I really should introduce myself properly before I go any further. I am a tow truck driver here in Amherst, and I can't tell you which company I actually work for, I will give you a few hints though. If you own an automobile in Amherst, you've probably dealt with my company at some point. Also, the name starts with the town you go to school in, and it ends with the word "towing."

Stop racking your brain and just forget about the name; it's not important. I will tell you that my good friend Dana has allowed me his column right here in the Daily Collegian this week to address the very students who put money in my pocket on a daily basis. I should mention that he has so graciously done so because I have agreed to waive the outrageous $75 towing price tag, as well as the $20 per day storing fee that my company had recently placed on his car. He's such a nice young fella, and he actually feels quite fortunate to be the one who helps a dumb, redneck tow truck driver from the Boonies - yessir, that would be me - finally bring his story to light.

First of all, I should mention that I am a 3rd generation tow truck driver. Unlike the majority of you city kids who move out here to the lovely Berkshires, I was born and raised out here amongst my pet cows and sheep, and my Pappy and Grandpappy's tow trucks. They taught me since the day I could milk Ol' Bessie in the barn that there is nothing finer than watching a dumb college kid from the city bitch and moan about having his car towed.

After all, why the hell else would anyone ever get any pleasure whatsoever from completely putting someone out by towing their car? It's like it has been implanted in my head that it's actually cool to drag away some poor schmuck's only means back to campus or to their apartment. Why else would any considerate, flesh and blood, human being get their jollies while doing it? There is absolutely nothing I love more (well, than maybe when the flock is in heat and a case of Old Milwaukee) than strapping my chains around your tires and taking her for a ride. Oh, and I get so hot when the car I'm towing has an alarm on it. Squeal all you want baby, you're still coming down to your new home on Old Sunderland Road.

I really shouldn't, but I'm going to let you all in on a little secret. Right now, my towing company, the University and the administrative departments of nearly every off-campus housing area are running a racket that could rival Al Capone's. That's right, every one of you is being extorted, robbed blind, by the very institution you have placed so much trust in. Think about this: how many purple stickers did Parking Services distribute to the dumbos in Southwest this year? That's right, and me and my girl were down there towing any one who had the sack to park on the grass beside the lot. How dare you anyway! Don't you know that we have the right to issue you a sticker, giving you permission to park in a specified lot, and then when you arrive in that lot and there are no spaces, that it is still your fault?

Or what about the situation down there in lovely Puffton? How many people live there anyway? Couple thousand maybe? Regardless, don't you think asking for more than forty visitors spots is pushing your luck a little? I don't know about you, but me and my co-workers down here at the towing company don't think it's unreasonable to ask that everyone who plans on visiting Puffton can somehow carpool down there, and fit comfortably into those forty spaces. (Dana's note: I am especially pissed about the Puffton situation, for it prevents me from spending more quality time with my boys Doug E. Fresh, Tozzie, and Jake. I wanted to give you boys a shout out - in an actual quality article written by a real columnist - since our "other boy" has already had his five minutes of fame.)

Just to be sure, nothing gives me my jollies more than heading down there on Friday and Saturday nights to tow some poor sucker's hooptie. Me and my boss who carries around the clipboard (I know you've seen him), will drive up and down that bad boy until we've dragged every car without a valid sticker right the hell down the street to suck another hundred bucks out of your pocket. Hell, I feel so strongly about the upholding of the parking laws here in the fine Commonwealth of Massachusetts that I'd tow your car for a quarter. That is the only reason why anyone could ever be so insensitive and so sad that they actually enjoy towing your vehicle.

Maybe you're like the many on campus who disagree with my profession, as well as my passionate love for it. Well let me ask you this: what would happen if, say, we just used the same policy that every other place in the free world employs when it comes to parking spots? You know, park wherever the hell you want. First come, first serve. The people in Puffton would be overrun by the rising number of visitors who would just visit to see the landmark sights and bus souvenirs, now that they could actually park wherever they want. My god, people who actually want to visit friends there would be able to do so comfortably, without worrying about the safety of their automobiles. College students don't have enough to worry about, studying for exams and writing papers, that they should actually be able to park where they want. Don't even get me started with those kids who actually bought and paid for the right to park in purple lot.

Bottom line is this: towing is an honest profession. Granted, it is an honest profession that thrives on screwing other people, but it is honest nonetheless. What can you do about myself and the other pesky tow truck drivers who live to ruin your weekends? Have your credit card ready, because for this limited one-time only low price of $95 per tow, you too, can have your vehicle moved without your permission.

Please don't be angry with me or my fellow tow truck drivers. After all, I am not upset at your ignorance of just how important my profession is. President. Doctor. Lawyer. Towtruck Driver. It's all the same, really, if you think about it. Once again, thank you to that fine young gentleman Dana for giving me this space to voice my concerns, and thank you for taking the time to read this. Now if you'll excuse me, I've got to drive my tow truck down to CVS to pick up a vat of Vaseline. The flock is in heat, and Scary Clipboard Man has given me the night off. Yee-hah!

To the editor:

I wanted to bring your attention to the swim articles published in Monday's paper (Dec. 4). I realize neither of you (Collegian Sports Editors Bryan Smith or Michael Kobylanski) compiled them, but the two people who did could really use some help with their styles. The men's article has several flaws in it starting with the first paragraph. Swim competitions are not "games" or "matches." They are meets. Another problem was in the mentioning of Ryan Fisher – he is a junior transfer, not a freshmen, and when writing about Chris Arsenault's victories, the butterfly is referred to as the "flystroke." If the authors need help writing the articles so they can get the facts and details correct, I'm sure they could look up any of our phone numbers if they cannot reach any of the coaches. As for the woman's swimming article... the sarcasm and rude remarks were extremely unnecessary.

Some examples of such remarks include: "Cuse was clearly the superior squad"... "One of the few bright spots for the Maroon and White" ... and the worst of all being "but unfortunate for the Minutewomen no lifeguards were on hand to lower down a rescue ladder." I hope you will take this letter seriously and do something about these articles. As an athlete, I know that the more supported we feel, the more we will want to perform at a higher level. We swam Syracuse for experience. We knew they would provide us with some of our toughest competition this season. This was to help prepare us for our shot at the Atlantic 10 Championship. I, as well as the rest of the athletic community would appreciate a fair representation of all the hard work we put into our sports in the articles that the Collegian publishes.

Regardless of a win or a loss, please show us your support. Thanks for your time and attention.

To the editor:

I would like to take a moment about the Nov. 29 article "History Repeating" by Simon Pongrantz. Bravo. As a Classics graduate student, and avid learner concerning the late Roman Republic, I must applaud his insight and comparisons.

However, no article is without flaws, or does not lead to questions and problems. Certainly Pongrantz has given me much to comment upon, both for the good, the bad, and the stupified.

The comparison of the late Roman Republic (c. 80-27 BCE) with its "rogue male" figures (Caesar, Pompey, Augustus, Sulla) to modern America and its elitist two-party system is intriguing. However, I would wonder about the elitism of the founding fathers, of politicians in the time of the Civil War (also called the "War for States' Rights" or "War of Yankee Agression"), and around the two World Wars. This may bring to light the fact that elitism in America – certainly as with Rome throughout the republic – has always been ruled by a wealthy oligarchy of sorts.

I am neither condemning nor praising either America or Rome, but I find it most interesting that the majority of Latin works that survive are from the late Republic, when the Roman upperclass had more leisure time, and authors such as Catullus, Horace, Propertius, and Lucretius could expound on former lovers and current farmland (or both). Today, it is not the upperclass, but the comparatively wealthy middleclass media that controls the opinion and the literature of today. Considering that movies, television, and novels are essentially modern forms of literature, it is the media that drives us to see them, and they are media in themselves, reflecting social commentary for the modern masses and for posterity. Some future civilization will be dissecting American culture by John Woo's directing style!

But I digress. Returning to the subject, I wanted to state that the late Roman Republic and modern American Republic are both swarming in media sources that modern scholars want to compare: both remember recent civil wars (Marius v. Sulla; North v. South), both were founded on brilliant principals by revered founding fathers (Brutus; Washington), and both seemed to be crumbling by the coutemporaries and critics (Cato was the Rush Limbaugh of his time).

Whnan's many people forget that speaking of an age while it happens is only playing the political fortune-teller. It's just like when in the last decade, the media termed the youth of America "Generation X." And it is no wonder that Generation X did not know who they were: they were defined within their context and what they were doing, not what they had actually done. It is truly a paradox.

America does not have private armies like Pompey, Caesar, Crassus, and Augustus did. The armies follow the Commander in Chief, but they do not worship him. My own brother is in the army, and he can't stand Bill Clinton. But he serves the country – the patria, if you will. An upperclass revolt is next to impossible using warfare.

Further, invoking Article Five to rewrite the Constitution? Well, nice idea, but the situation is not that bad. The ideas are still good, but the implementation is a bit cloudy.

Pongrantz mentioned the Sullan regime to restore the Republic was futile and bloody. Are we looking for a bloody dictator, or a peaceful restructuring? Further, the one percent that owns 95 percent of the wealth would be the Sullas to overthrow the government, and in that way we would be trading the noose for the firing squad: destruction is just that much quicker.

How this pertains to Gore and Bush: it doesn't matter what we do. The courts (read: oligarchy) will decide or decide to not decide (read: bureaucracy is meant to confuse the population) about the constitutionality (read: a bunch of rich men fighting over a figurehead position) of the elections (read: media influence). The populus, just like the Roman populus, must work for a living and doesn't have the leisure to compose poems or overthrow the government. Am I suggesting apathy? No. I am suggesting getting informed, trying to break through the glass ceiling, and becoming a participant; or I am suggesting getting informed, staying out of the way, and enjoying the whole ludicrosity of it all. In other words, "Know your role, and shut your mouth."

On a side note, I would like to offer an important correction – or what seems very important to me. The phrase is "senatus populusque Romani" not "publiusque", "Publius" is a Roman name, where "populus" is the people.

To the editor:

I could go on a rant about how narrow-minded Chris Masterjohn's article titled Private Property was and how convoluted the logic was, but that would be a waste of my time. Instead, all I have to say is that the justification for anybody to own any property (whether it be land, a car, computer, or any other material possession) has little to do with privacy or the freedom to use it. The true justification to own pretty much anything is that you paid for it with legal money. For most people this means money they earned from hard work at a job they probably earned by working hard in school. Your "solution" for dividing up land is simply communism. And communism, as can be seen from the fall of the Soviet Union, does not work. Even though I promised I would not rant, let me just say I find your "solution" absolutely repugnant. To think that some bum who dropped out of high school and works pumping gas would get the same amount of land or more than myself (just because he "needs" it) even though I worked my ass of to get a degree and good job so I could make lots of money disgusts me. The fact that you propose such ideas in your article seems to indicate you have rarely if ever had to work for anything.

(Editor's note: The following letter was written in response to an email sent to students regarding the avoidance of textbook buyback scams in favor of using the Textbook Annex.)

To the Editor:

Textbook buyback scams?! If there's a textbook buyback scam on this campus, it's run by the Textbook Annex, itself! The textbooks are sold at a high profit initially, and then bought back by the Annex at a fraction of the original cost. I say that if someone is coming by your dorm room to offer you a decent (read: more than 10% of original cost) price for your textbooks, then by all means take advantage of their offer! The Textbook Annex here is trying to continue maintaining a ridiculous profit by reselling books that they have bought for almost nothing back from students who often have to pay more than $300 per semester for just those same texts! Just because the Annex is not authorizing these people does not make their actions illegal or otherwise wrong.

Maybe they are entrepreneurs who are making eFollett and the Annex squirm! Good for them, exercising their initiative in a free market economy! I thought we still had one of those around here somewhere. Once you buy a textbook from the Annex, it's YOUR property. It's not the University's, and it certainly isn't the Annex's. You can sell it where you want to. Feel free to advertise around campus and get a better price than the pennies that the Annex offers! Don't let this email intimidate you with it's implied illegalities. You will not "receive the best possible price for your texts" from the Annex, and I don't think the UMass police will come running to your rescue when you find that you can make three or four times the buyback price that the Annex offers. The Annex is nervous about their prices being publicized, and have tried to stop the leak of an exorbitant deal of revenue that they want for themselves. Don't let them stop you from a reasonable offer.

5-0 at the Door

Nashira Baril
Collegian Correspondent

The first time it happened was on my 21st birthday. Since then he has periodically stopped by unannounced. He knocks relentlessly until I answer the door, always jamming his foot in, forcing the door to fly open. He always demands to know what I am doing and who my friends are. Sometimes he kicks them out and curses as he threatens to take me away with him. Why don't I call the police, you ask?

Apparently, somebody already has...

At some point, most of us have been in a dorm room, party, or apartment when that undisputable "police knock" resounds, silencing everyone, leaving faces stunned, students stammering, and wide eyes glued to peep holes. The issue of police harassment of college students needs to be addressed. Why is it that local police departments incessantly infringe upon the rights of students? This is not to blanket the actions of all officers, however, some members of the Amherst Police Department have been manipulative, disrespectful, and have threatened my roommates and me with arrest, jail time, and eviction...All for a noise violation?

Case in point: I am chillin' at home with a handful of friends (certainly well below the number specified on my lease agreement). A passive-aggressive neighbor calls the police who get all revved up and probably draw names out of the "Whose-turn-is-it-to-harass-a-college-student?" pot. They show up wearing attitudes that read: "I'm-in-blue-so-I'm-better-than-you!" Spitting threats and lies like it's their last day on the job. And I quote, "Next time I come back, you're coming with me." And "What part of 'noise violation' don't you understand?" These among several other choice words. I won't ask The Collegian to print.

I cannot make this argument with out making the connection between our harassment and the war against hip-hop. It is clear that hip-hop culture is under attack and I am beginning to take it personally. I wonder if the police would come if we were opera fans. Doubt the neighbors would even call...

I apologize to the families, non-students, and the like who reside in off-campus, predominantly student housing. But let's get real. You cannot expect to live within a one-mile radius of ZooMass, where the average age barely allows its residents to hang out uptown, and not expect the atmosphere that follows. Unless these folks moved in before 1865, they should have taken this into consideration.

My qualms, however, are not so much with my neighbors (although we are approachable and don't often bite) but with the treatment we have received from the local police department.

The Amherst Police Department has frequently harassed members of our community on the assumption that we do not know our rights or are too incompetent to interpret the constitution. Unfortunately, many students are unaware of their rights. It is imperative that students understand and exercise their rights when facing harassment at the hands of the authorities. You have the right to be treated with respect. However, not to suggest anyone takes these comments out of context and goes off at the mouth. Any offensive behavior ("conduct unbecoming an officer") can be reported to the Chief of Police on a civilian complaint form. Students can also contact Student Legal Services with questions and/or complaints.

To find out if you have been unfairly harassed contact Student Legal Services at 545-1995.

Former slave describes 10 years of suffering in Sudan to Harvard audience

By Heather Milum
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON - While slavery ended for Americans in 1863, when the Emancipation Proclamation took effect, a panel of speakers gathered at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government on Monday night said approximately 27 million humans are currently enslaved around the world, being forced to work for no pay under the threat of violence.

One of the panelists, 21-year-old Frances Bok, could attest to that statistic first hand. Frances was 7 years old when his mother sent him to the market in his southern Sudan village to get milk and grains. While running the errand, a northern Sudanese militia group ambushed the village and attacked its inhabitants.

"They were shooting people, they were beating people ... One little girl saw her parents killed and could not stop crying. To silence her, they shoved her in a basket and shot her in the head," he said.

Those that were not killed, including Frances, were sold into slavery to Muslims in the north, who are currently engaged in a civil war with the Christian southern Sudan.

"For 10 years, I was beaten every morning. They made me sleep out with the animals. They told me I was an animal," Bok said.

Frances managed to escape at the age of 17 and now lives in the United States, traveling as a spokesman. He works for the American Anti-Slavery Group, whose mission is to raise slavery awareness and abolish slavery worldwide.

"I am a lucky man because I escaped ... but my people are dying," he said.

According to Jesse Sage, associate director of the American Anti-Slavery Group, Bok's story is not uncommon. In many parts of the world, particularly Sudan, slavery is practiced more now than ever before.

"Today, with the population boom ... slaves are inexpensive and dispensable. The average price for a slave today is about $12," he said, compared to a price tag of about $60,000 per slave in the antebellum southern United States.

Sage said the cheap labor market makes slavery a global phenomenon and cited cases of Brazilian men being coaxed out of their homes with the promise of good work, only to be enslaved in the rainforest, and of millions of Indian children who are currently being held in debt bondage.

Sage urged the audience to learn more about these cases and take action.

"We're here to talk about us. About what we are going to do with our freedom. ... We have to exercise our freedom to help set others free," he said. "Ultimately, I want all of you to become abolitionists."

Wendy Patton, a representative of the National Security Council, said the United States is working hard to ensure that world governments recognize and fight slavery and slave trafficking. She mentioned several strides made by the United States, including training law enforcement officers worldwide, educating the public in Poland and the Ukraine about the human slave trade, and increasing economic development programs for women, who make up the vast majority of slaves.

The other panelists, however, expressed doubt that such minor actions could have much of an effect on a lucrative and widespread practice. Sage, Bok and Jay Williams, a Harvard University sophomore who recently returned from a visit to Sudan, encouraged the audience to let the National Security Council know that the issue is important and should be addressed by President Bill Clinton and by whoever takes his place in January.

"Why is President Clinton allowing slavery in Sudan?" Bok asked the crowd in broken English. "Why is the world silent?"

He scanned the young faces in the crowd and asked them to fight for the freedom of others.

"As students you are strong. You have big voices ... and you can end slavery," Bok said.

First-generation college students learn to deal with stress and hardships

By Angie Smith-Henderson
Daily Kent Stater (Kent State U.)

(U-WIRE) KENT, Ohio - He jumps out of bed at the crack of dawn, rushes off to school, comes home, scarves down a Little Debbie and heads off to work. He comes home, studies for two hours and finally crashes.

Mama never told him there would be days like this.

Brian Cutchall, like most college students in early December, is stressing over final exams. But for this non-traditional Kent State University freshman, these are his first college finals ever.

These are the first college finals, in fact, for anyone in his family. Cutchall will be the first one in his family to attend college. He is one of many first-generation college students at Kent State.

"First-generation college student is defined as neither mom nor dad graduated from a four-year institution," said Mary Romans, mathematics program specialist at the Academic Success Center. "The government has targeted first-generation college students as being more at risk for not graduating."

Romans oversees a government grant called TRIO, which is targeted to help at-risk college students. The list includes students from low-income families, students with physical and/or mental disabilities and first-generation college students.

"The fact that you are a first-generation student does make a difference," Romans said. "The government says so."

The differences from non first-generation students may be in the areas of family support, peer influence and income level.

"More first-generation college students tend to be low income," Romans said. "They may have to struggle with funding. They may have to work for some of their tuition money. That makes it so much harder."

Cutchall has experienced this hardship firsthand.

"My parents had no money set aside for school," he said. "My mom never went to college, and my dad was basically a factory worker, so there was no emphasis on school. They probably never thought to set aside money for college."

"It's been really hard to pay for stuff myself," he continues. "It's a pain in the ass to have to juggle work and school. But after working at several dead-end jobs, I was looking for a way to find a job with some security. I think this will all be worth it."

Jessica Sargent, a junior education major and first-generation student, has also faced financial hardship.

"My parents didn't save for my education," she said. "But luckily I've been able to get grants. Paying for books is a killer though."

Jennifer Simmons-Means, a teaching fellow at the Counseling and Human Development Center, has counseled many first-generation college students with financial difficulties.

"They didn't understand the importance of applying early for financial aid," she said. "They have working class parents who either don't have the resources put aside for college or they do, but won't support the student financially because they don't think school is important."

First-generation college students often lack not only financial support from family, but emotional as well, making success even more difficult.

"The government says that there is a relationship between lack of family support and his chances for success at the university," Romans said. "And if mom and dad have a degree, it's easier for them to identify with the students."

This is a situation Sargent can identify with.

"I don't think my parents really understand how much work is involved," she said. "If I'm trying to study, my mom will want to talk to me instead."

Cutchall has encountered similar problems with his friends.

"Most of my friends are factory workers," he said. "They didn't go to college. If it's a school night and they want to go out, sometimes it is easy to give into the pressure, say forget school, and go out."

Too many nights out plus a heavy workload has prompted Cutchall to drop a class.

"I was totally not prepared for the pressures of school," he said. "I definitely didn't have the discipline or time management skills to handle such a heavy work load."

This is something that Simmons-Means hears often from students.

"Time management is a big issue. Many times parents didn't emphasize studying at home. So the students aren't used to a regular study schedule," she said. "Some actually have no idea what studying even is. I have to explain it."

Sargent found this to be the case. "My parents didn't prepare me for the college workload," she said. "I thought it would be like high school. That was a breeze. When I was a freshman I was surprised to find that I actually had to read the book."

It's not uncommon for first-generation students to lack study skills, Romans said.

"Perhaps parents who have been students themselves can better instill study skills in their students," Romans said.

But both Cutchall and Sargent feel as if they can overcome this obstacle.

"I'm teaching myself how to study," Cutchall said. "I study at work when we are not busy. I'm doing okay."

And many first-generation college students are doing okay and better Simmons-Means said that falling into this category isn't a sentence for failure.

Jay Z and Ricky want to see some action on these pages!!

Local metal scene highlighted for a day at Skybox

HARD AND HEAVY 2000
Dec. 2
Skybox

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

2:00—It's Saturday. It's early. I'm getting ready to go to the Skybox for their Hard and Heavy 2000 show. I've been excited about this show for weeks, actually—so many good bands in one day on-campus is such a rarity. I'm all dressed up for the occasion—my crappiest jeans, scariest black sweater, black nail polish, black eyeliner and (of course) a freshly shaved head. I'm good to go—I grab my notebook and camera and head for the Southwest Purple Lot, on a quest for a great day of metal.

2:45—I'm at the Skybox. I'm milling around with the security and the bands who are just kind of chilling, waiting for things to get going. Showtime's been delayed because C60's singer tore his abs on stage and the band had to cancel. It's a bit of a downer, because I was looking forward to them, but not a huge deal: nine out of ten bands ain't bad, after all.

I'm chatting it up with Jon DiNapoli, the guitarist for Irepress, the second band who's going to play. Jon's a UMass boy who lives in Coolidge tower—this is sort of a hometown gig for him. He describes his band for me as "a mix of Deftones, Incubus, and Sevendust, basically." He agrees with me when I ask if it's difficult to get a gig in a hippy town like this.

"This is the first one we've gotten," Jon said. "We play mostly on the South Shore."

Irepress is going to record a five-song demo over winter break and has been talking with Universal records about a deal.

Oh, this is about the time I first hear that Eastcide, a band that I really wanted to see from my hometown of Plymouth, got signed to Universal three days before the show. Everyone I talk to is really happy for them.

I then talk to Doug Govoni, one of the two singers from Reset Smith.

His band is from Kingston, Mass. I ask him if he knows Matt Jeffers, one of my cousins from Kingston, and, of course, they turn out to be old football buddies. It's kind of cool.

Reset also has a local connection, with bassist Frank Melberg also being a UMasser. They played Bowl Day on Orchard Hill last year, and are hoping to move up to the Hill the Hill concert this year. (Note to Fill the Hill promoters: this would be a good idea.)

"We're kind of a Sevendust with turntables," says Doug. "We play a lot on the South Shore."

He talks about the South Shore scene, bands like Eastcide, Rebound, Breeding Ground, about how great it is. I'm actually from the South Shore myself, so I can vouch for this—the South Shore scene is insanely hot right now.

"We're making a lot of good friends in the hardcore scene, plus when people see our show it speaks for itself," Doug said, and I guess that really says it all.

3:15—The doors have been postponed from 2:30 to 3:30. I'm hanging out in the lobby with the Skybox people. There are 12 people waiting to be let in—a young, hair-dyed crowd.

ROB SCHULZE COLLEGIAN STAFF
Irepress, a metal band with a UMass connection, in the middle of their Hard & Heavy set.

3:55—The doors still aren't open. Ava, the boyfriend of the brother of a Skybox crew guy, is dancing around in an attempt to amuse me. It works. Rumors are flying about Eastcide now—one of the bands' A&R guys said that they weren't going to show because they got signed. People are talking about it left and right. I personally don't believe it, my hometown boys'll be here.

4:10—The doors are open, and a good 50 people are hanging out. I'm very impressed—that's a good amount of people for local bands this early on a Saturday. The atmosphere is great; you can tell that the Skybox employees are pumped. I'm pumped, and the crowd is definitely enthusiastic. I get the feeling this is going to be a really good show.

4:12—Reset Smith is on. Both singers are jumping around screaming, the guitarists are bounding, and even the DJ has a look of intensity on his face. The band has a hip-hop sort of style about them, baggy windpants and visors, but the music is all metal. The songs are remarkably good for a local band of kids my age, and their live show is actually tight. You have to love energy. "Wolfenstein 3-D" has a more mellow sound then their other material which makes it stand out in the set, as does an a-capella sample of Eve-6.

Most of the crowd is actually standing near the stage and not ten feet away—quite the accomplishment for the first band. At the end, the fairly good-sized singer launches himself into the crowd, which refuses to catch him and scatters like sheep from a wolf. Overall, I am really impressed with Reset Smith, and I do hope to see them at UMass again.

4:50—I'm talking to Rai from Simpl.e, one of the headlining bands in the Hard & Heavy bill. He's "very, very pumped up" about playing on this bill. I actually know this band's music, and I'm kind pumped about talking to this guy, but he seems even more excited to be talking to me. As the night goes on I would meet all members of Simpl.e, and they would turn out to be, bar none, the coolest guys you'll ever hang out with. Ria describes his band's music as being that "the heavy is really, really heavy, and the melodic is very beautiful," and he's right.

5:05—I have to cut short my talk with Rai because Irepress has started playing. I run out of the backstage area having only missed the very beginning of their set. My first impression is of a very heavy, downset, influenced sort of hardcore. Some of them are wearing visors. Again, the crowd is in motion, which blows me away so early in the day.

Irepress features a very dynamic singer, who can scream and sing, and a very talented drummer who can, even when the rest of the band is being slow and melodic, make the overall effect heavy and threatening. Jon and the other guitarist are doing very complex guitar things that really impress me; I just don't expect that much virtuosity from UMass bands, I guess, based on all the hippy trash I've seen around here. "Devour" is a very good song, as is "Sempre Destre." There are some sound mix issues, but it improves as the set goes on. Irepress gets cut off before they can play their last song, which sucks, but they still have won a fan (me) with their set.

5:42—There are 113 in attendance according to the tally at the front desk of the Skybox. Very impressive, or at least I think so.

5:55—Edgar takes the stage. I wasn't very big on this band; they had some inventive guitar work, but the bassist was wearing a visor and the singer had this septum piercing that I just wanted to rip out with my bare hands. To be honest, they just looked like the punks that I used to beat up in gym class when I was a senior in high school, and that just wasn't doing it for me. If I had to describe their music, I could do it in one word: screaming. They had a song called "Suck it Up." That kind of says it all.

6:30—I'm talking to Kem, the guitarist from Collapse Into Reason. He's kind of a freaky-looking guy, even by my loose standards, but he's quite nice and approachable when talking with him. His band's from Northampton, and the only place you can get their recording is from Lucky's on Main St. He describes his music as "Dream Theater, Slipknot and Peter Murphy beat the shit out of each other for three hours, then play." Wow, a band not influenced by Sevendust—I'm excited already. I walk away very interested in seeing his band play, as they should be very different from the rest of the bill.

6:45—Eastcide still isn't here. Tom, the guy who runs the Skybox, assures me that they'll be here. Rumors to the contrary are ubiquitous by this point. I go into the greenroom, and the food is simply demolished; I guess rock 'n roll is a hungry business. The guitarist from 7th Rail Crew walks by with another guy gossiping about the injured singer from C60.

6:50—Collapse into Reason is onstage. I'm really very impressed by this band; I'm into this sort of metal-electronica-industrial stuff. The band is all gothed out, and the drummer has a combination acoustic-electric kit, something I've never seen before. Despite fighting with the sound man through their whole set, they put on a really great show with a really great sound.

"Disconnected" I liked a lot, and was the song that stuck out in my mind the most after the show. The singer gets hit in the back of the head by the bass guitar about halfway through the set and is evidently bleeding profusely but, as he says, "It's not a good show unless I have a scar." Amen to that, and this was a good show.

I forgot to write down the time, but somewhere after CIR I was called away by Skybox security because they wanted me to be an actual reporter and tell the world that Facilities Services had set up a table downstairs to check out IDs, and they were turning away all these kids who were underage. (The show was 18 plus.) On my way down I ran into Jordan Hakkinen, the singer from Edgar with the obnoxious piercing, who happens to be 17, who said that the people downstairs almost didn't let him up until he showed them his laminate to prove that he was in the band. He said they they were very polite about it, but he barely made his show.

I went down and talked to John, the Facilities Services guy who was running the table. He was, in fact, very polite, despite the fact that he obviously had no desire to be running this table or talking to me. He showed me the little scanning machine that he was using to check IDs and said that he'd turned away "just two or three" people. He said that a college ID wouldn't do it, and that it had to be a license that the machine could scan. He was happy when I left him alone.

When I got back to the Skybox, Tom was on the phone with people and I guess he got it straightened out, as the table went away, and the little scanning machine wound up on the Skybox desk where you bought tickets. This wouldn't be the last time I heard about this, though.

I once again forgot to check my watch when 7th Rail Crew got on stage, but it didn't matter because they were awesome and time was the last thing on my mind while they were running through their set. Made up of classics like "24/7" and "What Eye?" as well as songs from their new album, Open Your Eyes, like "Purify" and (my personal favorite) "Genuflect," they ran through their time with humor and great crowd interaction from lead singer Siete. (Little-known fact: Siete once attended this fair University, living in Kennedy tower.) As it turns out though, the band that was supposed to come on after them, Diecast, was lost in Southwest and hadn't arrived yet, so 7th Rail had more time than they bargained for, and thank God they did, because their impromptu encore was awesome.

Joined on stage by Ken (the lead singer of Gangsta Bitch Barbie) and a kid in an Eastcide shirt from the audience, the band covered a rap song that I didn't recognize, then "Jump" by House of Pain—keeping it real Boston style, no doubt. Then, minus the audience member, the band and Ken threw out the most fun song of the night, a semi-rapped, sped-up version of Motley Crue's "Shout at the Devil." It was, and I say this with no hesitation, probably the most fun I had all night.

Sad Rockets fly music's future

SAD ROCKETS Transitions
Matador

By Tom Frazer
Collegian Staff

Cast your mind back to your childhood. Everything was funk, rage. You didn't know drum sound-cards existed and criminal past and The Family Stone was the collective consciousness into the Sonic earth. As opposed to the reality of a horrendously embarrassing nerdiness that you'll will take silently to my grave. Remember sitting down with brothers and sisters on family occasions to watch acceptable cinematic feature films for example Grease, Indiana Jones or Footloose.

Many films have sections that attempt to predict future musical trends. Star Wars had that parts in Labba the Hut's hut. Fame had the protege pianist that was going to transform the future of music through his use of technological wizardry. His music was "too after nature for most staid ears."

Sad Rockets debut release Transitions is like a modern day reincarnation of this type of sound. It is retro-futurism. It is all recorded on analog mixing desks using huge Moog synthesizers. Imagine a recording studio scattered with wires and repair kits. Debris from electronic salvage sessions where played and recorded all 13 tracks on the album (somewhat adding to our "sound scientist" image). The recording has elements of alternative post-rockers Tortoise, Finnish Space Jazz weirdo Jimi Tenor and British trip-hoppers Portishead. It is singularly self-conscious and tends toward pretension. Nevertheless, it is redeemed through its tunefulness and catchy melodies. Another plus is when you shut your eyes, you can almost picture yourself in a fashionable bar or restaurant, chatting to the beautiful people of the Lower East Side.

The occasional acoustic guitar comes as a shock, and tracks without unrecognizable scratchy bits are definitely in the minority. "Winter's Over" and "Twenty-Seven" are perhaps the album's more memorable tunes, but even these are too considered and labored, missing that essential "je ne c'est pas" to be singles.

"Boogie Electric" (the only tune to have a vocal part, or more explicitly a vocal sample) warns us against the dangers of getting electronic organs, and that in the future to "make love we will have to plug in." If you are willing to overlook some of the album's more esoteric moments, and experimental alternative pop is your thing, then this album might just be for you. It's a damn sight better than that idiot Moby anyway.

VH1 awards hear the people

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Correspondent

While other award show ceremonies are usually voted and created by a group of artists, music-business people,and journalists, the My VH1 Music Awards were created entirely by fans from all over the world, becoming the first award's show of its kind.

Since October, fans have sent VH1 their ideas on unique categories for the show (e.g. double threat Musician/Actors). After the 23 categories were announced, fans returned to the VH1.com site and chose the nominees for each category. Finally, nearly three-million fans voted for the five finalists in each category and the winners were announced at the show on Nov. 30 at the Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles.

Creed, the most nominated band with nine nods, walked away with most wins - four in all, including the breakout Welcome to the Big Time award, Song of the Year for "Higher," and Two for Two award for voters who thought that their second album was as good as their first.

Veteran rockers the Red Hot Chili Peppers claimed two awards, one for the Must Have album for Californication and another for the Pushing the Envelope Video for the title track. Santana also won two statuettes including the Man of the Year honor.

Voters also gave statuettes to Faith Hill for Woman of the Year and Sexxiest Video for her skin-revealing performance in "Breathe." In the category of Most Entertaining Public Feud, Eminem vs. Everyone appropriately won. Ricky Martin earned the Booty Shake award for his derriere-swinging performance in "Shake Your Bon-Bon."

Metallica, who won two awards, took the exercise of complete fan control of the show one step further by having their fans select one of three nominated songs the metal act should play. Moments before the group took the stage, producers told Metallica that viewers wanted to see the band perform "Fade to Black" and Metallica, who had rehearsed all three songs, obliged. Other performances included a, needless to say, garish performance by Christina Aguilera and U2's show-opening performance of "Beautiful Day," with singer Bono entering into the auditorium as he sang the opening lyrics. Bon Jovi, who won Video of the Year for "It's My Life," also performed to the raucous crowd.

Since the winners were tallied instantly during the live program, producers were worried about technical glitches during the show, but only one part of the show ran into a stumbling block. The winner for Your Song Kicked Ass But Was Played Too Damn Much (Santana's "Smooth") did not reach the TelePrompter in time for the presenter, Tenacious D, to present it onstage, though it was already posted on VH1.com.

Since its inception, VH1 has never had a music award's show leaving the honor to MTV's outrageous Video Music Awards. And since VH1's age demographic of 25 to 34 year-olds is older than MTV's target audience, the VH1 awards turned out to be a much more sedate affair. The night was therefore less entertaining than the MTV VMA's.

Jon Leguizamo, the host for the evening, was clearly nervous, stumbling over his prepared jokes - only to receive blank stares from the audience. He relied on controversial shtick for his comedic material. For instance, he opened the show with a raunchy rap that included the line "I've been to bed with Mandy. I couldn't get Christina, so I did her brother Andy."

The show was dedicated to Joe C., Kid Rock's sidekick, who died Nov. 17 as a result of a lifelong illness, cellac disease. He was 26.

Due to Diecast being lost, Gangsta Bitch Barbie (who was supposed to headline) went on next. I'm going on memory here, because for GBB I had to put away my notebook and get up the front of the pit and just let it all go. All reporterlike objectivity aside, I'm a huge GBB fan and this set was stellar. Ken Smith's energy is beyond belief, and just the overall sound is unforgettable. They played "Kingpin," "This Ain't California," "Smokewood," "6.5," and "Godzilla" (on which I actually rapped with GBB Mc Mysell. Rapped. With Gangsta Bitch Barbie). This set was the best overall.

Afterward, I had to opportunity to talk to Ken. He told me that their new (as-yet untitled) debut for Grand Royal records would be out in March, and that it would include new versions of several songs from their last album. This is Not a Test, including "Kingpin" and "6.5," but not, unfortunately, "Godzilla" (not that I'm bitter). They're trying to get on a tour for the summer, and are going to be at the Palladium on Dec. 15 with 7th Rail and others; I suggest you get there.

10:15—I finally remember to check my watch again as Diecast takes the stage. They have a strong opening, but then the kids that they brought with them (all wearing the same black "Boston Hardcore" shirts, all covered in tattoos, all drunk) proceed to ruin it for everyone. After getting punched in the face while chewing my pen, I have to go wash my rapidly-filling-with-blood mouth out, and miss most of their set. What I heard was good until their jackass fans had to screw everything else. I'll never understand the hardcore "let's kill everyone to have fun" mentality. It's one thing to be in the pit, that's cool, and you go nuts, but when you start hitting random people who aren't even looking and who aren't anywhere near the pit, it's over the line.

I talk to the Simple bassist who says that he personally knows that "there were at least six or seven" of his band's fans who were turned away downstairs, and that is just a few of what he suspects—and that is a significant increase over the two or three I was told earlier. This carding situation just sucks overall—no one is happy with it.

Eastside, I find out, is definitely not coming.

11:00—Simple finally takes the stage. Unfortunately, most of the crowd had left after Diecast, so Simple didn't get to play before a great number of people. However, I have always maintained that the mark of a great band is one that will play as hard for 15 people as for 1500, and Simple certainly proved that they had the chops to fulfill that requirement on this Saturday night.

Their straight-up nu-metal rocked the night to a close. They played standards like "Last to Know" and "Middle Skool" off of their stellar CD Rise of a Fallen Empire as well as unreleased new songs from an as-the-future album, all of which sounded good.

"Will you remember me when I'm gone?" sang singer Keith, and the band ensured that the faithful few who got to witness their show would do just that.

12:30—I'm back in my room reflecting on a long day of metal. My verdict? Best sets: GBB, Simple, 7th Rail. Best Surprise: Reset Smith. Worst surprises: Eastside and the carding table. Overall? A great day of music and great guys from great bands.

1:00—I'm in bed. My ears won't stop ringing.

European soccer: they got game

JUSTIN PEARSON

Matchday eight of the European Champions League got of to a flying start yesterday with Leeds United pulling off a shock 1-0 victory in Rome against Lazio.

Twenty-year-old striker Alan Smith scored the only goal of the match in the 80th minute following a clever flick on from fellow striker Mark Viduka. Leeds central defenders Jonathan Woodgate and Lucas Radebe were in fine form neutralizing Lazio's $70 million strike force of Marcelo Salas and Hernan Crespo.

Lazio manager Sven-Goran Eriksson could now very well be out as team boss following its recent poor showings. The defending Serie A champions have no points to show for their first two Champions League matches and have struggled recently in Serie A. Just last month Eriksson signed on to become the new England manager once his contract runs out in June, but that move may now be pushed ahead if Eriksson is indeed fired.

In other Champions League action, Bayern Munich overcame a two-goal deficit in London to secure a 2-2 draw with Arsenal. Goals from Bayern midfielders Michael Tarnat and Mehmet Scholl cancelled out a fourth minute strike from Thierry Henry and an early second half strike from the Nigerian, Kanu. Both teams played much better than they had on Matchday seven, but were unable to pull out the victory.

Defending European Cup winners Real Madrid eased past Anderlecht 4-1 in Spain while Lyon jumped out to a 3-0 halftime lead over Spartak Moscow and held on to win by the same score line.

Matchday eight rounds itself out tomorrow with another quartet of matches across Europe. Last year's runners-up Valencia travel to Greece to take on Panathinaikos, Deportivo la Coruna takes on AC Milan, while Galatasaray play host to Paris St. Germain. In the final game, Manchester United will travel to Arnold Schwarzenegger Stadion in Austria to take on Sturm Graz.

• United manager Alex Ferguson will have midfielder Ryan Giggs available after recovering from a hamstring injury. Giggs played the final 17 minutes of United's 2-0 win over Tottenham on Saturday and now looks set to make his first start since November.

• Belgium's greatest international player over the past two decades has been forced to retire from professional soccer due to chronic osteoarthritis of the hip. Enzo Scifo was a stylish center midfielder who collected 84 caps and scored 18 goals for his country. Scifo, Belgium's Player of the Year in 1984, spent most of his career playing abroad with clubs such as Inter Milan and Monaco before returning to his homeland in 1997 when he signed with Anderlecht. For the past week Scifo has served as the stand-in coach at his local club Charleroi in the Belgian first division.

• Over in England, former England National Team coach Terry Venables has signed on as a coach with Premiership strugglers Middlesborough. Venables, who led England to a semi-final appearance at Euro '96, has agreed to join his friend and current 'Boro boss Bryan Robson for the next six months in order to try and save the club from possible relegation. Venables will oversee team selection but Robson will still be in charge of Middlesborough's transfer dealings.

• Just to the north in Scotland, defending champions Glasgow Rangers now look set to mount a serious for the title against arch rivals and current league leaders Celtic. The Rangers looked dead and buried just two weeks ago but the signing of Tore Andre Flo form Chelsea and a pair of league victories, including a 5-1 demolition of Celtic, has breathed new life into the club.

The only thing that looks like it could stop Rangers right now would be a lack of players. Both Arthur Numan and American Claudio Reyna were sent off in Sunday's 1-0 win over Hearts and look set to miss a substantial amount of time. Joining them on the sidelines will be Dutch midfielder Giovanni van Bronckhorst. The hard-working midfielder has been out of action with a groin injury since October and is still a ways away from a return.

ing alongside Bradman, Lloyd and Boycott.

England captain Nasser Hussain led the tributes to Cowdrey describing him as "one of the most gifted batsmen of his generation".

Hussain added: "He was also one of the nicest people you could meet in the game and a good friend to the England team - he will be much missed."

Then there is the other side of cricket, a sport spiraling downward thanks to money and greed, and it has hit the sport again as former Indian Test Captain Mohammad Azharuddin and fellow Test player Ajay Sharma. They have received life bans from the Board of Control for Cricket in India.

The reason why – Azharuddin admitted to fixing three one-day international matches.

The 38-year old Azharuddin was one of India's greatest ever batsman, having scored more than 15,500 runs in Tests and one-day matches during a 15-year international career. But unfortunately he is just another in an ever-growing list of cricketers that has fallen as the sport seems to be in turmoil because of its worst scandal ever.

It started in May when former South African Captain Hansie Cronje was banned from the sport earlier this year for throwing matches. Cronje had named Azharuddin as the cricketer who introduced him to an Indian bookie, but the former Indian skipper has denied this. But an investigation has led to his dismissal.

However, the trouble might not end there with Azharuddin. An Indian Government Investigation last week has led to six current or former Test Match Captains being named as those who have had regular contacts with bookies.

These players include former England captain Alec Stewart, former West Indies captain Brian Lara, former South African captain Hansie Cronje, Australia's Mark Waugh, Pakistan's Salim Malik, and Sri Lanka's star batsman Arvinda D'Silva, along with former captains Martin Crowe of New Zealand and Arjuna Ranatunga of Sri Lanka.

In fact, the Pakistani National Board has already banned Malik for life for fixing matches as well. The news of these great test cricketers being named along with the paranoia of this past year's events has led to worldwide concern over the sport and how many and who have been involved with throwing matches. And, of bigger concern, how long will it take for the sport to recover.

The newest allegations show that there is a long way to go before this situation will be fully taken care of. But the scars that this scandal will have on the sport might last forever.

The fourth-year coach did have many things to be proud of this past season, not the least of which was the fact that her Minutewomen had the best record of any team she has had since she decided to take over at the helm in Amherst. It was not the first time that Shea had been on campus, however, as she played here in the early 1980s, guiding her team to two Final Four appearances as well as an appearance in the first ever National Championship game.

Throughout it all, though, Shea has managed to keep everything in perspective.

"A coach is only as good as their players," she said. "We had a great season. We wanted to take it a step further, but making the Final Four is a tough thing to do. Just look at the teams that made it last year. Only one of them [Maryland] was able to make it again this season."

Track teams get off on the right foot

Minutemen earn third-place finish in season opener

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

Coming off a second place finish last season in the Atlantic 10, the Massachusetts men's indoor track team will be looking to improve on their solid outfforts of last winter this year. The team, however lost several key components to graduation, that were vital to its success a year ago.

Judging by the performance on Saturday though, there will be many people willing to step up in place of the departed athletes. The Maroon and White opened up this year's campaign with a strong third place showing Saturday afternoon at Boston University. The team finished the day with 82 points, finishing behind a tough New Hampshire squad (147 points) and the host Terriers (90 pts).

"The first meet is always very exciting, because it gives us the opportunity to see the kids we haven't seen in over six months," head coach Ken O'Brien said. "The unknown factor is the younger kids, so the coaching staff was eager to get a look on Saturday."

The Minutemen were highlighted on the afternoon by senior captain and local native Mark Sylvander of Chicopee. He left his other competition in the dust, winning the 400 meter dash with a blistering time of just under 50 seconds. Sylvander was followed closely behind in the event by teammates Hugh Reid and Mike Howell who finished fifth and sixth, respectively.

In other events, the tandem of Jeff Jason and Eric Uliano dominated their shot put foes to finish one-two in the event. Jason had a monstrous throw of just over 48 feet to win, while his Uliano was right on his heels with a throw of a few inches short.

"Jeff was the number two shot put and discus thrower in the state last year, and we're really excited about his improvement. We're happy with the way he's made the college adjustment," O'Brien said.

One other Minutemen highlight was sophomore Anthony Ortega, who emerged victorious in the long jump with a leap of nearly 22 feet.

This season, it appears that the team's strength is the balance it possesses over every event. O'Brien does not see one real weakness the team has, which should translate into plenty of success for the upcoming year.

"We're a little less top-heavy than in the last couple years, but we have enough depth across the board to make significant progress," O'Brien said.

The Minutemen will hit the road again this Friday as they travel to Kingston, Rhode Island to participate in the Rhode Island Pentathlon.

Second: good place to start for UM track women

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Getting off on the right foot – an idea that was imperative in a few ways to the Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team this past weekend as it headed east to Boston University for its season opener.

First, the Minutewomen needed to get their footing just right in order to participate at their usual high level of competition.

Second, the Maroon and White wished to begin its season with a solid performance that would be a quality first step toward a successful season.

UMass accomplished both goals as it competed admirably and began its indoor season by bringing an impressive second place finish home to Amherst from the capital city.

The Minutewomen scored a total of 123 points, besting three out of four competitors on the way. They fell behind only first-place winner Central Connecticut State, which posted 145 total points.

The strong showing for the Minutewomen was a complete team effort, but it was one that was led by senior quad-captain Carole Laplante. She finished first in the shot put, with a toss of almost 39 feet.

In general, the throw was one that LaPlante was relatively pleased with.

"It was a good way to start out," LaPlante said. "My first meet this year was better than my first meet last year."

"The team did a great job," she added. "It was the first collegiate meet for a lot of them and the young kids really came through. We seemed to come together as a team, which doesn't always happen, but was really nice to see."

Junior Megan McCormick, who transferred last year from George Mason University, had a great weekend. She placed an integral second in the one-mile run for the Maroon and White with a time of just over five minutes.

Junior Katherine Blais also ran an impressive race and was able to cross the finish line just seconds later to secure fifth place for the Minutewomen with a solid time of 5:25.63.

Overall, the Minutewomen have taken that all-important first step toward a successful season. Now they must stay in the groove and make some minor adjustments along the way in order to improve on the fly and continue their early success.

The Maroon and White will ride a wave of momentum south into Rhode Island this weekend, as it returns to action on Saturday, Dec. 8, and participate in the Rhode Island Pentathlon.

A strong second place finish was a pleasant way for head coach Julie LaFreniere and the Massachusetts women's indoor track team to open the season.

Free-agent signings causing a stir in MLB

Around the Horn with Matt Brady

Even though spring training is still almost three months away, there has been a flurry of activity in Major League Baseball already this offseason. And, needless to say, there is plenty of action that still remains to be settled in what might be the most talented free-agent class in recent history.

The biggest signing so far has obviously the Yankees' acquisition of Mike Mussina. The pinstripes bagged "Mussie" in what was their latest in a long list of major free-agent signings giving him a six-year, 88 million dollar contract, and most importantly giving the Yanks what might be the greatest starting four in the post-expansion era.

Mussina joins hurlers Roger Clemens, Orlando "El Duque" Hernandez and Andy Pettite. Those four combined had a 4.07 ERA in the regular season, a number that would have ranked sixth in the American League if it had been posted by an individual. Simply put, the top four starters for New York had a lower ERA than the top hurler on nine out of the other 13 team in the league.

Okay – I've spitted out enough numbers to make any non-Yankees fan sick to its stomach. This has been a common theme across the nation as seemingly everybody is complaining that the Bronx Bombers have gone above and beyond the payrolls of any other team Fans ceaselessly complain that they buy championships.

So what? Unfortunately, the world seems to work that way sometimes. This is a country where the rich get richer if the rules permit them. Baseball was functioning perfectly well in this system for a long time, so no incentives were taken to improve it.

But now, things have turned sour. Around half of the teams in the Major Leagues lost money last year, and if baseball wants to survive as an industry, there has to be some kind of salary cap put into effect. Otherwise, payrolls will continually skyrocket until salaries explode to a level where they cannot be brought back to reality.

Speaking of that, Alex Rodriguez is seeking a long-term deal that will pay him $20 million or more per season. He is the prime free agent on the market, and is arguably the best player in baseball.

But a $200 million contract? That is just absurd. It seems just yesterday that everyone was gawking at the contract that Kevin Brown signed with the Dodgers making him the first $100 million man in baseball history.

Nonetheless, it seems that A-Rod will sign a contract of that magnitude. The only question remains, where? He reportedly has trimmed his list of teams down to five, including Texas, Seattle, and probably Los Angeles, Atlanta and Colorado.

There was a report earlier this week that he asked the Mariners to move the fences at Safeco Field in so that his numbers would improve. A-Rod hit only 13 long balls in the spacious field, and had a batting average that was over 80 points higher away from Seattle.

The M's organization promptly issued a statement stating that they would not make such a change just to accommodate one of their players. Good job by them. Safeco is an incredible ballyard, especially when compared to the crumbling architectural disaster formerly known as the Kingdome.

Another major free agent signing happened this past week when the Rockies acquired former Brave and Red Dennis Neagle. The southpaw signed a five-year, $51.2 million deal that will keep him pitching half of his games in the ever-punishing Coors Field.

Reportedly, Colorado will not stop there, as they are trying to finally build a pitching staff that can compete in the senior circuit. It is rumored that they will make a contract offer to Mets pitcher Mike Hampton, who has established himself as one of the best hurlers in the bigs. Word is that they will try to make an eight-year package, probably at more than $10 million a year.

If the Mets should lose Hampton, they will be forced to resign Rick Reed, who is seeking a four-year deal that will pay him about $8 million each year from the NL champs. The former replacement player had another solid season last year despite being injured, going 11-5 with a 4.11 ERA.

Another pitcher the Mets will look to if Hampton bails will probably be Atlanta thrower Andy Ashby. Ashby seems to be a perfect fit for the Mets and vice versa, as his great sinker and control low in the zone translates to an abundant amount of ground balls for opposing hitters. New York probably has the best defense in the Major Leagues, with Robin Ventura, Rey Ordonez, and Edgardo Alfonzo all being among the top few at their respective positions.

As for the Red Sox, they will have a lot of work to do in order to stay with the rest of the teams in the AL East. The latest talk has Cleveland slugger Manny Ramirez coming to Boston. This would be an interesting acquisition, as Ramirez is viewed in somewhat the same light as Carl Everett in that he is not much of a clubhouse leader or team player.

Nonetheless, numbers are numbers and Ramirez has impressive ones. Despite missing 44 contests last year due to injury, he hit 38 homers and had 122 RBI to go along with a .351 average. Had he played even 20 more games, he probably would have been the favorite for AL MVP. Now consider him in Boston with that big green wall sitting so close in left field. Ramirez could easily hit 50 homers and 50 doubles for the Sox, so the following weeks should be interesting for fans in Boston and throughout the league.

Shea earns regional honors

Coach earns pick as Northeast Coach of Year

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

The honors are still coming in for the Massachusetts field hockey team, and coach Patty Shea is the latest recipient after picking up the Northeast Region Coach of the Year award, given out by the National Field Hockey Coaches Association.

"It's a great honor," Shea said. "It means a lot because it's voted on by your peers. That is the humbling part about it. And there are a lot of great coaches out there."

Evidently, Shea's fellow coaches believed that guiding her Minutewomen to a 19-4 record as well as an Elite Eight appearance in the NCAA tournament was enough to garner the honor. However, this recent award was not the first honor that Shea received for the 2000 season, as she was already named Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year at the conference's field hockey banquet last month in Northampton.

Unfortunately, after her UMass squad beat Boston University in the first round of the NCAAs, it came up short in the next round against ACC powerhouse North Carolina, falling by a 5-1 score.

According to Shea, though, that loss did nothing to take away from what her team accomplished on the year.

"I'm really proud of the team and where the program has been and where it is going," she said. "It took a lot of energy to get where we were and we can't let that last loss diminish what we were able to accomplish throughout the year."

Interest in cricket seen around the globe

David Rose and Tom Frazer

Of all of the great non-American sports in the world, cricket still commands the greatest derision and incomprehension. Ironically, it is probably the sport that should be most easily understood by a country with such a fascination for facts and figures. The American preoccupation for statistics is incredible – just turn on any TV and consider the numerical analysis contained within the coverage for proof.

Cricket fans spanning the globe – from Trinidad to Sri Lanka, Australia to England, will today discuss the Australian victory over The West Indies. Not because it represents the continued dissention of Windies Cricket; not because it coincides with the announcements that Brian Lara has again fallen in the ICC batsman standing (from a position of virtual messiah status); and not because it gives the Ozzies a 2-0 lead in the series.

The significance of the test victory is that it gives Australia a record-breaking run of 12 successive Test wins. Moreover, the sheer style of the victory was irrefutable. Glenn McGrath, the Australian opener, surpassed the magical figure of 300 test wicket with the capture of the West Indies' three senior batsmen - their captain, vice-captain and ex-captain. Even more incredibly he took all three wickets in successive balls – a hat trick.

From the highs of a great sport it is sad to also note the lows. Two world-renowned cricketers fell this week, one to a stroke after a legendary career. The other took the money and will now take a seat, permanently in disgrace.

Colin Cowdrey, who died at the age of 67 earlier this week, was the personification of the 'English Gentleman'. Cowdrey is considered by many to have been one of the greatest batsmen of all time, stand-

SGA Administration gets the decision it wanted

Senate sacked

Gabriel Tavarez

New elections to be held soon; RSOs to keep their money

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

At approximately 8:00 p.m. last night, Chief Justice Gabriel Tavarez ruled that the Senate branch of the Student Government Association was unconstitutional.

Tavarez read the full four-page Judiciary decision to a stunned Senate body – a decision which leveled numerous accusations against individuals and against the September election practices.

At the end of it all, the entire Senate had been dismissed, Speaker Jim Eltringham had been asked to step down and new elections had been ordered to take place no later than Feb. 21 of next year.

"There were 26 violations of Title 8," said Tavarez during the questioning that followed the decision's reading. "I went through and counted them myself."

Title 8 of the SGA By-laws governs the election process. Of the 26 violations, the Judiciary's main contentions were the formation of the election commission, the misrepresentation of the apportionment schedule and the misrepresentation of the three electoral districts.

SHALINI MARTI/COLLEGIAN

Jeff Howe, Seth Avakian and Sheila Tunney all listen to Gabriel Tavarez read the Judiciary's decision last night.

Tavarez began by addressing the failure of "many" to place two members from each of the Area Governments on the election commission. The failure to do so was in direct violation of Title V of the By-laws, according to the decision.

"If this action would have been followed through with, all ensuing infractions of the election could have been avoided," stated the Judiciary's ruling.

The blame for the violation of Title V was placed on, "but not limited to," SGA President Jeff Howe.

"President Howe as outlined in Title VII Chapter 3 Section 1 is supposed to remind the Area Governors of their responsibility," stated the decision. "It does not seem that he did so."

Furthermore, the decision went on to blame Eltringham, Howe and Area Governors for their failure to replace election commissioners when vacancies were found in those positions. According to the Judiciary's decision, the empty positions were in violation of Title VIII Chapter 7.

No formal sanctions were made against Howe in the decision.

Tavarez next addressed the issue of the election's apportionment schedule, a document used to determine the number of Senate seats from each electoral district. The Judiciary claimed that this number was never properly determined and that the blame lay with Speaker Eltringham.

"Speaker Eltringham, at no point during the hearing, revealed where exactly he received his apportionment schedule. He was asked time and again and could provide no clear cut answer," stated the ruling. "It is the charge of this University Board that Speaker Eltringham, in fact, lied about the apportionment schedule."

This was only the first in a series of reprimands made against Eltringham on the night. He would eventually be asked to step down as Senate Speaker and accused of violating the Code of Student Conduct.

The Judiciary further made allegations that Eltringham ignored the advice of Associate Speaker Michael McCarthy with regard to the apportionment schedule. The ruling stated that Eltringham directly contradicted some of McCarthy's testimony.

"Speaker Eltringham directly misrepresented himself and, in turn, disregarded the By-laws of the SGA," stated the ruling. "The Speaker's oath of office prohibits Mr. Eltringham from performing his duties when he knows to be in violation of the By-laws of the SGA."

Tavarez then ordered the Attorney General or the Associate Speaker to investigate the matters surrounding Eltringham's alleged violations.

"It is the sentiment of the Student Judiciary that Speaker Eltringham has blatantly violated his oath of office, the orders of a University Board and the Code of Student Conduct," stated the Judiciary decision. "It is the opinion of this body that Speaker Eltringham should willingly suspend his duties as the Speaker until a thorough investigation into the aforementioned allegations is completed."

Before concluding the reading, Tavarez spoke on the lack of three proper electoral districts. According to the ruling, fraternities and sororities fall under the category of "Non-Residential Hall On-Campus Residential" housing not the "Off-Campus Commuter Area." Thereby, the members of Delta Chi, who were counted among commuter students, were in fact misplaced, according to the ruling.

"The result of these errors is misrepresentation of students within the Senate," stated the ruling. "Speaker Eltringham's wrongful apportionment of 34 seats to the commuter area is, indeed, harmful error as he was aware that his calculations were flawed."

Tavarez then dismissed the Senate body as unconstitutional.

The ruling concluded by addressing SGA finances and making plans for next February's elections.

With the Finance Committee now dissolved, the Judiciary gave control of SGA Finance reserves to the Coordinating Council.

"The Student Judiciary grants the Coordinating Council temporary discretion of the SGA Finance reserves. This means that they will be able to grant funds to Registered Student Organizations in the manner prescribed within the charter of the Finance Committee," the decision stated.

The Judiciary also ruled that RSOs could, in fact, keep the money allotted to them thus far this semester, even if it were granted by an unconstitutional body.

"The Student Judiciary asserts that while an unconstitutional body performed these acts, they are not wrong," the decision stated. "It is the unanimous opinion of this University Board that the Senate is not to blame for the faults of the Speaker, the President and the Elections Commission."

During the questioning, Tavarez added, "It's not practical. It's idiotic. It's moronic to ask for that money back."

Following the reading of the Judiciary's ruling Tavarez faced a barrage of mostly angry questions from the body that he had just dismissed. These ranged from Constitutional points raised by Citizen Ed Cutting and Chair of University Policy Committee Michael Whitehouse to the validity of the Judiciary following the ruling.

Tavarez explained that since the Judiciary was approved by the Coordinating Council, it was still a con-

Senators vent anger after decision

After Chief Justice Gabriel Tavarez read the Judiciary's ruling that the Senate was unconstitutional, senators, with the exception of only a very few, seethed with frustration.

"There were only about 10 people that were happy with this decision," said senator Jason Pelzek. "Every other person who was elected was pretty much ticked off. Everyone who has put in three to five hours a week."

"You would figure that the SGA would be on top of its game," Herman Pisalomino said on the Judiciary dismissing the Senate, "but I'm sorry to say that they've disappointed me and made me feel like less of a student."

Many student senators also expressed concern and frustration that students' needs were not being served by the Judiciary, in fact, some went so far as to say that they were never even a consideration in the decision.

"The students need were pissed on," said Speaker of the Senate Jim Eltringham, "but that's a moot point anyway, because that was never an issue in all of this."

Senator Craig Reiser added, "I think Gabe Tavarez or the Judiciary Committee is hurting the students and anything that could have gotten work done. It's not just unfair, but as Tavarez said, 'It makes its own consequence.'"

Some senators, including Chair of the University Policy Committee Michael Whitehouse vowed to keep working in the best interests of students despite the ruling. Whitehouse explained that he believed the Judiciary's ruling was unconstitutional for violating a clause in the SGA Constitution, which states that the body exists for the welfare of the students. He added that his committee will continue to meet to address student needs.

"This might be an opportunity for students to bring forth issues outside a formal setting," said Whitehouse. "They won't have to deal with the bureaucracy of the weekly meetings. The bottom line is that if a student has a good idea, the administration will listen."

Michael Taugher, now the former Chair of the Ways and Means Committee, echoed this sentiment.

"Even though the Judiciary has thrown us out and there's no committee, there's still a dozen students interested in working on the budget," he said. "Seth brought out the fact that he was going to hire me as his personal assistant of finance, but I don't see myself working for Seth, instead of working for specific RSOs to make sure their money isn't sacrificed for petty squabbles."

One of the key issues not only last night but also throughout the Judiciary hearings was the election of 34 commuter seats, 32 of which came from the Greek community. Greek and non-Greek senators identified their presence as one of the main contention points in the election.

"I was extremely upset with the way that the fraternities were treated. I was upset that they were looked at as a group. I found very little to convince myself that they somehow were detrimental to our organization," said Central at large senator Peter Zwahlen. "They actively participated and probably had the highest rate of attendance at all of the meetings. I thought they were received negatively."

"From the beginning of the Judiciary hearings, it seemed that it was one sided. You're supposed to be unbiased, but it seemed like there's no way we could win," said Picalomino. "You're supposed to be unbiased, but it seemed like there's no way we could win."

People also expressed concern over Speaker Eltringham, who perhaps received the worst of last night's proceedings. Eltringham was charged with lying, violating the Code of Student Conduct and ultimately asked to step down as Speaker.

Even before last night's meeting, Citizen Asif Savani said, "It bothers me that this man up here [Eltringham] is going to take all the shit for this and he's not going to fight back. Jim, I think you need to stand up for yourself."

"They dragged his [Eltringham] name through the mud. They dragged our name through the mud, and now the SGA means nothing to this campus," said Jon Moore. "It's a joke."

The SGA leadership expressed optimism about the new elections and the prospect of progress being made in the Spring semester.

"I think it's unfortunate that it has dragged on this long, said SGA President Jeff Howe. "Next semester, the elections will be constitutional and the Senate will hopefully pass a lot of legislation to benefit students. I'm looking forward to it."

Student Trustee, Seth Avakian said that he did not feel victorious as a result of the decision, but vindicated because the Judiciary made the right choice.

"There's a lot of work ahead of us. Last year proved we can do it," said Avakian. "We'll be working our asses off all January to get ready."

Again though, this optimism was not shared by many. Dejection and anger pervaded the Senate body.

"In general, I believe this decision set the SGA back, not just the SGA, but all campus," said Jeff Bazydlo, former Chair of the Finance Committee. "We're now the laughing stock of this campus. I won't be part of this again."

Eltringham and Bazydlo also explained that there was legal recourse that they could take before the SGA moved forward.

"We're looking at what we can do in a court of law about this," said Eltringham. "I've thought about quitting various times through this, but then I get kind of scared about how many people will get screwed if I do."

Mothra? No, just meat eating butterflies says prof

By Kate Schiff
Collegian Correspondent

Carnivorous butterflies. It may sound like a Mothra tribute or a bad B movie, it was the subject of a lecture by Harvard Professor Naomi E. Pierce at Mount Holyoke College Tuesady night.

Pierce, a Hessel Professor of Biology in the Organismic and Evolutionary Biology department at Harvard University, spoke of the unusual relationships that some butterflies have fostered with ants. These relationships are typically mutually beneficial, but in a few cases the butterfly larva trick the ants into becoming their dinner. Her lecture, entitled "Life History Evolution in the Lycaenidae: Cradle-Robbing, Meat-Eating, Ant-loving Butterflies" explained the significance and origins of these unusual relationships.

Butterflies that utilize ants as a strategy for survival usually do so as caterpillars. By emitting pheromones similar to those used by the ants for communication, the caterpillars are able to avoid being attacked and eaten. In addition, the caterpillars produce a nectar that the anis eat in exchange for protection from other insects.

"The caterpillars have a 'honey dew' gland which secretes the nectar through the spines on the caterpillars' back," explained Pierce. "The anis chew and suck on the spines to get at the nectar. The secretion, which is mostly sugars, also contains high levels of the amino acid serine. Experiments have shown that ant colonies that are allowed to forage on caterpillars grow at a significantly higher rate than those who lack the nectar in their diet."

In exchange for the nectar, the ants will tirelessly defend the caterpillars against larger predatory insects like wasps. Pierce's research has shown that about 1 in 100 caterpillars will make it to adulthood if the ants protect them. By comparison, only 1 in 1,000 will reach adulthood without them.

In a few cases, this evolutionary adaptation has taken an unfortunate twist for the ants. Using the same pheromones that attract the aid of the ants, the caterpillars are able to make a dinner out of the young of their helpers.

"The caterpillars are able to trick the ants with chemical cues. The ants will carry them into the nest where the caterpillar is able to feed on the ant larvae while being completely ignored by the ants. It's as if the caterpillar were one of their own," said Pierce. "Other species use similar cues to trick the ants into feeding them mouth to mouth like they would the for the queen."

Pierce goes on to say that interactions such as these are rare.

"There are approximately 200,000 species of moths and butterflies worldwide, but there have only been about 200 documented cases of caterpillars parsitizing ants in this way."

Other insects that are regularly dined upon by butterflies include: aphids, coccids, hoppers and cicadas. The harvester butterfly, which can be found here in Massachusetts, is among the predacious butterflies, feeding exclusively on woolly aphids.

If you would like to learn more about these insects or see a variety of live butterflies, contact the Magic Wings Butterfly Conservatory in south Deerfield at (413) 665-2805 or on web at www.magicwings.net

U.S. election drags on in judiciary

By Chris Thompson
Collegian Staff

The U.S. 11th Circuit Court of appeals rejected George W. Bush's motion to subtract the results of hand recounts of Florida ballots from the state total yesterday, while Al Gore's legal team fought in Leon County Circuit Court to throw out absentee ballots which they claim are illegal in two Florida counties.

The 11th Circuit Court of appeals in Atlanta ruled against plaintiffs in the cases of in Siegel v. LePore and Touchston v. McDermott, which sought to disallow the results of manual recounts in several Florida counties from being included in the state total. Lawyers representing Bush argued that hand recounts in specific, often predominantly Democratic counties put Bush at a serious electoral disadvantage.

However, in the ruling the court said that the Bush campaign "suffered no serious harm, let alone irreparable harm" as a result of the recounts, noting that Bush lead Gore in the certified vote total.

The Florida Supreme Court had extended the state deadline for certification of its votes to allow for the completion of hand recounts in several counties. Gore reduced Bush's lead from 930 to 537 votes after the recounts were included in the state total.

In Leon County Circuit Court Democratic attorneys pursued litigation to throw out votes in Seminole and Martin counties, which they say are illegal. The attorneys argued that election officials in the respective counties allowed Republican staffers to add voter identification numbers to absentee ballots applications. According to Florida law, an absentee ballot can't be mailed out without an identification number.

Democratic lawyers read a statement from Sandra Goard, Seminole county's election supervisor, who said that she had allowed Republican officials to add voter ID numbers to several ballot applications.

Goard admitted that she allowed Republican official Michael Leach and a second man to fill in the numbers at the party's request.

In her statement Goard said that she had never previously allowed a person outside of her staff to add information to an absentee ballot application after it had been submitted by a voter in her two decades as election supervisor.

Goard also admitted that between one week and 10 days before the election, Bob Poe, Florida Democratic Party chairman, called to protest the addition of the voter identification numbers.

"Did you offer to Mr. Poe the opportunity to let the Democratic Party do that?" Democratic lawyer Gerald Richman asked of Goard, whose statement was read by her attorney Terry Young.

"Mr. Poe did not request that," Goard said in her written testimony.

Goard also said that she was a Republican but that that fact did not enter into her decision.

Richmond called for the exclusion of Seminole counties' 15,000 absentee ballots – a move that would give Gore a victory in Florida.

Bush lead Gore by 4,797 votes in the Seminole County absentee ballots and lead Gore by 2,815 in Martin Counties' absentee ballots.

The Martin County case is still in pretrial hearing stage.

Al Gore said on Tuesday that the actions of the electoral supervisors in Seminole County were "unfair."

"More than enough votes were taken away from Democrats because they were not given the same access that Republicans were," Gore said.

The Republican leadership in the Florida legislature announced yesterday that they would meet on Friday to consider naming the state's 25 electors.

In a joint press conference Senate President John McKay and House Speaker Tom Feeney expressed the need for Florida to be represented in the Electoral College which meets to select the President on December 18th.

"We are protecting Florida's 25 electoral votes and over 6 million voters," McKay said.

McKay said that the legislature was not likely to select

Gazit to speak on crisis in the Middle East

By Melissa Hammel and Sasha Senderovich
Collegian Staff

Major General Shlomo Gazit, a former general for the army in Israel will speak tonight about the conflict in the Middle East at the Hillel House.

The event, which is sponsored by UMass for Israel, Hamaqshimim, JSU and the Hillel House, is entitled "Update of Conflict in Israel." It will be held in the Hillel House Kosher D.C. and will begin at 7:30 p.m.

Danielle Ben-Harris, President of the UMass Students for Israel and organizer of the event explained that the Gazit would be speaking about a number of issues, including what it was like to be a general in Israel and what it is like to be a member of the military in that country.

"He will be speaking about the current crisis in Israel," she explained. "He will also address what it is like to be an Israeli during this time period for the country."

She explained that the group felt that Gazit would be a good speaker because he was involved heavily in the peace process and also had an integral role in the Oslo Peace Accord. Among other things, Gazit has worked for almost forty years in the Israeli defense establishment and is recognized as a leading authority on Israeli security and defense issues. As Coordinator of Israeli Government Operations from 1967 to 1974, he was responsible for the policy and administration of the West Bank and Gaza. Following that In 1974 until 1979 he headed the Military Intelligence for the Israeli Defense Forces, and in 1978 he was a member of the Israeli delegation during the official peace negotiations with Egypt.

Upon his retirement from military service, Gazit served a four-year term as president of Ben-Gurion University in Beer-Sheva and from 1985 to 1988 as Director-General of the Jewish Agency in Jerusalem. He also worked as a senior research associate at the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies between 1988 and 1994.

After returning from the US in 1995, Gazit was appointed by Prime Minister Shimon Peres as Advisor on Palestinian Affairs and as his special delegate in meetings with Chairman Yassir Arafat. He resigned from this post following the change of government in 1996. Since 1995, Gazit has been serving as the Chairman of the Galili Center for Defense "Hagana" Studies, as Advisor on Intelligence and Security Matters to the Defense Establishment, and as a Senior Research Associate at the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at Tel-Aviv University.

Among his many publications are The Carrot and the Stick, dealing with the first two years of Israeli policy in the West Bank, published in 1985. His second book, Trapped Fools, published in 1999, discusses Israel's policy in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip from the earlier years until the present.

The event is free and open to the public.

Professor writes book about 60's

By Karen Madsen
Collegian Staff

Nick Bromell, a University of Massachusetts English professor, defines his new book, Tomorrow Never Knows, as an attempt to explain the importance of rock and roll, and an exploration of a 60s that many people know about, but very few have written about.

The work discusses the experience of rock and roll and psychedelics, and what it meant to the youth of the 60s.

"There really is no such thing as the 60s," said Bromell, "My book is about a 60s: what it was like to be young, white, middle class, in college and confused, and excited about the world you were coming of age in."

He began writing the book in 1993 as a counter to some of the images he saw in the scholarly histories and popular cultural accounts of the decade.

"I think our culture is very undecided about the about the 60s. Some people completely hate it. Some will defend it to the dying end," explained Bromell. "As they fight it out, their messages get simpler. In reality, there's truth to both sides. It was an extraordinarily complex moment."

Bromell believes that these different images come out of the tumultuous social and political climates of the decade.

"I think the 60's were an earthquake," he said, "and they force us to rethink what history is, what truth is, what youth is and what music can do."

With regard to academics in America, Bromell thinks that the envisioned revolution of the 60s experienced some degree of success.

"The pressure of political events on academic curriculum at most schools forced students and professors to think again about what was important to learn and think about," he said. "The revaluation that most colleges and universities were deeply tied into the military-industrial complex forced students and professors to ask hard questions about academic freedom."

The influence of this era is still very much felt today, according to Bromell, as indicated by the Nader movement. He sees the potential for two generations of progressives to join together.

"This is symbolized by the new Santana album. It's got the 60s love message, but it also has young voices singing their message," Bromell explained.

A significant difference that Bromell sees between his generation's attitude toward music and the attitude held by students today is in the diversity of tastes.

"When I was young, the question was 'Do you like Folk or Rock?' and if you liked rock the question was 'Do you like the Stones or the Beatles?'" said Bromell. "One of the consequences is that it will be harder for this generation to unite around a shared musical sensibility, for better or worse."

Bromell hopes that students will share his appreciations for the historical importance of the 60s.

"I'm teaching a course in contemporary poetry," said Bromell. "As we read poets who are writing today, I'm suddenly more aware than ever of the profound ways the 60's changed the way we think about life."

Scott not the only one packing

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

What do David Scott, Sherry Penney and Peter Cressy have in common? They have all resigned from being Chancellor at a University of Massachusetts institution under President William Bulger's tenure.

Sherry Penney, Chancellor of the University of Massachusetts Boston campus, announced her resignation after pieces of a critical review were leaked to the Boston Globe. She will step down Jan. 1. No interim Chancellor has been named. From 1995 to 1996, Penney served as interim President of the University during the searches that recommended Bulger for President.

Peter Cressy left his position as Chancellor of the Dartmouth campus to become president and Chief Executive Officer of the Distilled Spirits Council of the United States, a national trade organization in July of 1999.

Jean MacCormack, interim Chancellor of the Boston campus during the President searches of '95-96, currently serves as interim Chancellor of the Dartmouth.

It has been one week since Chancellor David Scott has announced that he would resign after June 30, making him the third Chancellor in two years to resign. Rumors have been circulating as the campus wonders about the future. Administrators say not to expect any quick answers.

"Changes in academic life take a while," said Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos. "Things don't happen overnight and the rumor mill goes wild."

Chuck DiMare, Directing Attorney for Student Legal Services, has been a University employee for more than twenty years. He's heard all sorts of rumors.

"I had heard that Bulger was immediately going to start a search," DiMare said. DiMare is not surprised by the Scott's resignation.

"We are just ending a major capital campaign. Its not uncommon that a chancellor would leave after a capital campaign," DiMare added.

The President Office assures the Amherst campus that these rumors are just that.

"It's too early," said University spokesman John Hoey. "Those conversations are just in the beginning stages. He [Scott] just announced last week."

The Board of Trustees recently established two search committees for permanent Chancellors for both the Boston and Dartmouth campuses. The University described the purpose of the committees in a press release; they "are designed to attract broad and diverse input from within the University and from the community served by the campuses." No such committee has been established for the Amherst campus, nor has an interim Chancellor been named.

The process really hasn't begun yet," Hoey said.

Deputy Provost John Cunningham doesn't expect any change to be too traumatic.

"We have the value of time. We're going to go forward with the campus's mission," he explained.

Cunningham has his own predictions on the identity of the next Chancellor.

"I have no way of predicting. They [the Trustees] will pick somebody internally, or they'll pick someone from outside. That's a pretty safe prediction," he said jokingly. Cunningham knows better than to make predictions though.

"It's way out of my league," he added.

To date, the Chancellor has refused all requests for an interview.

Tavarez tried to assuage his audience with reassurances that it was not its fault and the members could run for re-election, but the messaged seemed to fall on deaf ears.

Cries like "This is ridiculous" and "Answer the questions, you prick" echoed from the crowd of senators.

After Tavarez refused to answer any more questions, Eltringham did manage to beg one more of the Chief Justice.

To the question, "So, do we all just go home now," Tavarez could only shake his head and say "yeah."

Library adds three millionth volume to Du Bois stacks

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The W.E.B. Du Bois Library celebrated a milestone yesterday, welcoming its three millionth volume into the collection.

"This is quite a significant event in the life a library," Director of Libraries Margo Crist said to the audience at yesterday's reception. "The last similar celebration was fifteen years ago."

The volume, Gypsy and other Poems by James Baldwin, with etchings by Leonard Baskin, held special meaning for those assembled.

"They were inspirations in my life," said Professor Michael Thelwell of African-American Studies. They came from such very different backgrounds, but "as artists they embodied great similarities."

Baskin passed away recently and Baldwin died unexpectedly before the book was finished.

"This celebrates not only our three millionth volume, but also our rich history of academic heritage," said Provost Cora Marrett. "Today is an opportunity for us to pause and enjoy past success while keeping an eye on the future."

The catering and flower arrangements may have surprised some visitors. Coordinator of the event Linda Seidman summed up the occasion's purpose:

"This is a celebration of the book itself," she explained. "We've been planning this event for almost a year," said Crist.

Daniel Grehnrich, a bookbinder, described his life-long fascination with Baskin's art, and the work that went into making the book. Grehnrich's craft of hand binding and design gave the volume a distinctive look.

"It's a clean, clear, sober look appropriate to the poems," he said. Grehnrich described the anxiety he felt at giving Baskin the first bound copy of the book.

"I handed him the book. I was sure he would say it was all wrong, that he wanted something different, more fancy. I would suffer a breakdown, divorce, electroshock and a career change – not necessarily in that order."

The afternoon ended with Chair Esther Terry of the African-American Studies Department reading five of Baldwin's poems from the book. The last poem she read was the title poem, "Gypsy."

Terry's impasstoned reading of Baldwin's descriptions of oppression and fear at the hands of federal officers moved several in the audience to tears.

any electors until next Wednesday, the day after the December 12th deadline for naming electors.

Lois Frankel, the Democratic Minority Leader in the House, called the move "the ultimate partisan act."

"I think it would be naive to believe that the speaker of the Florida House and the Senate president are really calling the shots here," said Frankel.

When asked if Florida Governor Jeb Bush, younger brother to the Republican presidential candidate, would be involved in the selection of electors, McKay said that he had no answer at this time.

The Florida Supreme Court will hear half hour arguments today to consider whether or not to take the appeal of Gore's election contest in Florida. On Monday Circuit Court Judge N. Sanders Sauls ruled that Gore's contest had no basis, and that his lawyers failed to prove the results of the election would have differed if manual recounts in Palm Beach and Miami-Dade counties had gone forward.

Florida's slate of electors was awarded to Bush after the state's election certification, but the official results may be overturned through the disqualification of votes in Seminole or Martin counties, or if the Florida Supreme Court orders recounts in Miami-Dade and Palm Beach counties. Neither candidate can assume the presidency without Florida's 25 electoral votes.

Us to Administration: please take over SGA

This is a plea by a student organization that always attempts to keep student interests at heart. We ask the Administration at the University of Massachusetts to take control of the Student Government Association.

We ask that our embarrassing SGA administrators, President Jeff Howe and Trustee Seth Avakian, be removed from their positions immediately because they have proven unable to handle themselves in a mature manner that is in the best interest of the student body.

We ask that the $1.7 million in student money previously controlled by SGA be distributed by the Administration to the appropriate organizations.

We ask that any possible charges against Senate Speaker Jim Eltringham be dropped immediately, for he has done nothing to warrant such treatment.

We are sad and embarrassed that we have to ask for such a thing, but we have seen no evidence that the SGA administrators are interested in students, or their needs, or their issues. Instead, we have only seen evidence that Jeff and Seth are selfish little children, embarrassments in their job who have ruined the SGA with their sophomoric actions which have cost the people they have been elected to represent: the students.

They will, of course, claim otherwise. They will claim that they are acting in the best interest of students. They will claim that this decision will, in the long run, make things better for students. This is wrong.

Their bitterness about losing control of the Senate has led them to attempt to get Senate Speaker Jim Eltringham to resign his elected position before being possibly expelled from the University for incorrectly guessing about the number of elected commuter seats in the SGA.

With all of the constant turmoil on this campus, with the constant flux of politics surrounding UMass, the students of this campus need an organization that will properly represent them and leaders to properly lead that organization. Instead we have been stuck with leaders who work against that elected organization because they aren't able to control it.

But Howe and Avakian aren't solely to blame; their associates are equally guilty. The Chief Justice of the Judiciary, Gabriel Tavarez, as well as Howe's follower Rebecca Austern, have both proven to be so weak-kneed that they both did exactly as Howe would have wanted. Tavarez, who only has his job because Howe gave it to him, threw out a Senate that Jeff Howe didn't like, while Austern has proven to be a puppet of Student Government politics, blindly mouthing whatever Jeff and Seth tell her too.

It is their failure that leads us to ask for intervention by our Administration who could not possibly do worse than our leadership has. Our Student Government Association administration has embarrassed us while potentially bankrupting our clubs.'

The point of the Student Government Association is to serve the students. Our elected officials are meant to have only the best interests, desires, and well-being of every student at the University of Massachusetts as their overwhelming and supreme perogative. The student body has been forgotten, and it will not forget. The memory of failure will live in the minds of the students, and the perpetrators should realize the reprecussions.

Jeff Howe and Seth Avakian are failures. They should be removed and our failed Student Government Association should be replaced next year with new people. If it isn't, if their behavior is allowed to continue, there is no reason to have a Student Government – they cannot complete their responsibilities.

All I want for Christmas

I'm comfortable enough with my masculinity to say that I think Hello Kitty rocks.

ROB SCHULZE

With Christmas nearly upon us, I feel it incumbent upon me, as a community service gesture if nothing else, to give out my Christmas List to the UMass population in general. My parents still haven't quite gotten over that whole incident with the satanic altar and my sister's hamster, so obviously I ain't getting shiznat from them. The responsibility thus falls to you, the UMass community, to provide me with copious gifts this holiday season, lest I be in a permanent bad mood for the next 370-ish days. And I know nobody wants that.

1) Peace on Earth, or at least at metal-shows.

This isn't even a fake one. I would really like for everyone to just get along, but, barring that, I'd settle for just not getting my ass kicked every time I go to a concert. Seriously: I'm a huge music fan, and I love my violent, aggressive, hate-spewing, sex-inducing, body-pierced death rock as much as anyone else, but the fact is that I'm 5'7" and 145 pounds. The one thing that pisses me off more than just about anything else is when I'm the only guy at the entire show who knows the words to any of the songs, who cares in the least about the band, and who actually came for the music and not to get drunk and punch, but I'm prevented from having a good time by these vodka-addled jocks in American Eagle shirts who just LOVE to step on little guys like me. It's one thing if you're in the pit; in that case go ahead, kill at will, and I hope someone even bigger than you comes by and pokes both your eyes out, but leave me and by fellow weaklings alone. I just want to go deaf in peace.

2) A winter hat that fits.

As the single baldest man on campus (and, consequently, the sexiest) I have a driving need to keep my head warm in the sub-arctic New England winter. If you've never shaved your head then you have no idea of just how much heat you can lose off your noggin when it's unprotected. Of course, all winter hats are meant for men with Michael Bolton poofhair, so I'm flat out of luck, unless I want to look like I'm hiding a sandwich up there or something. Listen, up, UMass: get me a hat. I'm not kidding.

3) An E-Z At Home Self-Castration Kit

This would solve so very many of my problems: My romantic life has been absolutely fan-tastic this semester, in the sense of two bad breakups and a whole lot of misery resulting in being awake at four AM listening to the new Cold CD. I've decided that I'm done with girls forever, and just to take away the temptation to ever look at another female again, I've decided to eliminate the source, so to speak. Don't cry, UMass – you will soon find another pasty bald skinny fingernail-painted manbeast to take my place as your sexual fantasy (Another gift that could come along with this one would be an E-Z At Home De-Castration Kit, just in case I do ever meet a girl.)

4) A stout stick.

This would be used to beat some sense into everyone who wears a visor, and to inflict boundless pain upon any and all associated in any way with Parking Services.

5) A big stuffed Hello Kitty

I'm comfortable enough with my masculinity to say that I think Hello Kitty rocks. I already have a pencil at home and a McDonald's Happy Meal toy in my car, but I've got nothing Hello Kitty-related in my dorm room. In case you haven't seen my room, it really isn't very welcoming, with scary metal posters on the walls and piles of my dirty underthings laying about like corpses. A really big, cute Hello Kitty stuffed animal would, I think, really brighten up the whole motif. Plus, it would provide something with which to cuddle at night, since I won't really have a different option (see gift request # 3).

6) The quickness of the jaguar, the intelligence of the owl, the slyness of the fox, the strength of the bear, the endurance of the camel, and the dedication of the dog

This may enable me to get into some classes that I actually want to take at the University of Massachusetts.

And, lastly:

7) A grilled cheese and tuna sandwich from the Coffee Shop

I figure I'll get hungry at some point on Christmas, and this is what I want you to get me so that I don't have to be hungry any more. These things are so good, especially when they're made by Zane, who has to be the baddest mother fker on this entire campus. I would rather knife-fight Edward Scissorhands than screw with Zane, and I truly mean that, but he also has to be the best short-order cook in the business.

So, that's it, UMass. You'd best get shopping, or Christmas is going to be very painful indeed.

Liberal speech

The Republican protest in Miami-Dade over the closed-door recount is my favorite moment in the election thus far, if for no other reason than it brought into bold relief the utter hypocrisy of the left. Didn't you know that free speech belongs to the left?

Democrats can riot and rebel at the drop of the hat, generally defend the indefensible, and hurl wild accusations without basis. Jesse Jackson shows up in Florida the day after the election, talks of racial intimidation, a deliberately confusing butterfly-ballot as if was part of a process of intimidation (never mind that it was written by a Democrat and published in the newspaper beforehand in accord with Florida law), and takes to the streets, as if it were, yet again, Selma 1965. Massive protests in Seattle and Washington, D.C. All of this, we're told, is wonderfully symbolic of American democracy in action, a great testament to the meaning and spirit of the First Amendment. But then a handful of Republicans, who are moved to protest only after several outrageous legal maneuvers, an actual violation of law, and weeks of patience, are accused of undermining the democratic process. Because they objected to a closed-door counting of ballots based on loosey-goosey standards to suit Al Gore, they are accused of intimidation and violence. Good God, I've seen more intimidation and violence in a college seminar, where no conservative dares speak his mind for fear that nine out of ten liberals will roll their eyes. Some yahoo congressman from New York thinks he smells a "whiff of Fascism."

Fascism? This from a man who remained silent as Al Sharpton and Jesse Jackson hurled unsubstantiated allegations of racial intimidation. Aside from which, the members of the canvassing board themselves say they weren't intimidated! Now Liberals are demanding "law and order." Forget free speech! Truly, the First Amendment belongs to the left, no others need apply.

This would all come as a great surprise, unless you happen to teach college. There's a general pattern that exemplifies the left's hypocrisy. When you push students to defend their arguments, it's usually thought to be part and parcel to education. If you suggest, for example, that religious beliefs had to be downplayed and rendered "safe" according to The Federalist Papers, most liberal students think this is appropriate as it often pushes conservative students to re-examine the role religion plays in politics. Suck it up, this is education, they tell their conservative peers. If only. All too often the minute you probe a liberal student on his beliefs, there's only outrage.

Predictably, this happens every time I teach Roe v. Wade. When you try to get those students who are emotionally committed to Roe, but haven't the faintest hint of its intellectual justification, to actually think about it, to defend abortion from a legal and constitutional perspective, there's angry silence. Roe is accepted dogma; it is not to be put to the knife. While it is perfectly acceptable to probe a conservative student's opinions, it is unacceptable, apparently, to do the same with a liberal student. The purpose of education, I take it, is to debunk the conservative of his views, while ensuring the liberal that he has chosen wisely. And I take it this is what a good many professors do, as my liberal students are often shocked when they are asked to justify themselves in the same manner that my conservative students are.

And so it is with the left. Theirs is the moral cause. Their methods and reasons can go unquestioned. They may riot, protest, lie, slander those they disagree with as racists, all because they need to win. Conservatives, on the other hand, are to shut-up and take it—denied, even, their First Amendment rights of speech.

Our under-appreciated educators

SAM WILKINSON

One of the teachers at my high school died last week. Ronald Glover was a teacher who was revered and loved at my school. He taught biology, which I wasn't good at, and AP biology, which I really wasn't good at. I never had him for class.

I knew him, though. He helped me with some different things that I did at my school pertaining to the Student Council. He knew his way around the school and its political intricacies.

His students loved him. He was slightly overbearing, had a mind for a dirty joke, and was one of those teachers who was always just as fun with his students as he was good. There's an importance there, for some teachers seem only to be able to handle the teaching, and others the fun, but those who can mix the two are the truly talented.

Truly talented or not, his loss was a loss for my community, a loss for the students who were taking his classes, a loss for the students who had taken his classes, and a loss to a teaching community that is more disrespected than perhaps any other.

Constantly put upon to do more and give more and to do it for less, the loss of Ronald Glover, like the loss of thousands of teachers each year, is something more than the death of a person who happened to be a teacher. It is the death of a pseudo-parent, except this is a parent with hundreds of children.

Our teachers are as valuable a natural resource as we will ever have in these United States, yet our politicians rarely fight to see them paid fairly, our critics rarely recognize the truly great things that they do, and our people never seem to grasp fully the impact that these people have on our lives.

We all have favorite teachers. For every one of us, from the most popular football player to the lowliest stooge, there is, so often, at least one teacher who affects us in some sort of important way. Kicking us when we're down to get us back up, giving us support when no one will, our teachers are more often treated as baby sitters than as role models, as if the elementary, junior, and high schools that we attend are day-care facilities, not the places where we are, for better or worse, turned into the people we are today.

So often, the hours and hours and hours of work put in by teachers are forgotten or ignored: their low pay is the penultimate joke about the unfairness of our society, and yet nothing is actually done. The plight of the teacher, to form and reform the developing mind, to educate those who are interested and those who are not, is one of the greatest in America, and yet we do nothing.

Except, perhaps, mourn when we lose a truly special one.

How long will it take for our presidents and mayors and governors and legislatures and Congresses to do more than remember those that we have lost with a passing word? How long will it take for our politicians to realize that one of our greatest national treasures is going forgotten?

We campaign against war, we campaign for memorials, we campaign for tax cuts, we campaign for the elderly, and all while our teachers are left to go to waste. Critics lambaste our teachers, calling them faulty and lazy, claiming they are stupid and ignorant, and those are the people that leaders listen to. They chastise the unions with the "audacity" to ask for raises when budgets are so tight. They talk about cleaning up our education system, of sending kids to private schools, of cutting funding.

But never do they take their ideas to "clean up" education in the opposite direction – no increases in funding, no raises for teachers, nothing like that. It is silly and needless and embarrassing, the way we ask our teachers to make us into citizens, and knowledgeable ones at that, yet offer no them no fair compensation, nor recognition of the time and energy that they exert on a daily basis to better each and every one of us.

Ronald Glover's death is a blow to his community, to his colleagues, to his students and to his family. He was a good teacher, a smart man, a nice guy and third parent to countless numbers of students.

He is gone now, but people like him, or the work they do, or the person he was, should never be forgotten.

Arts and Living Presents

Critical Condition

However they review...

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

The nature of critique is quite negative; often, the only point a critic has is to expose a work's flaws to interested parties. With music especially, a genre where so very much of it is produced – think of the sheer number of local bands then expand that number into our area, our county, our state, our part of the nation, then the entire nation, then our hemisphere, then our world – critique is of the utmost importance.

Like art, there is so much of it out there that there must be some sort of a dividing line between what is and is not good. But what is it?

The proverbial tough question to answer.

Goodness, as always, is in the ear of the critic. Our friends and our families are critics, so are DJs and movies, but media's critics are supposed to be the truly good ones. While one critic can praise rhythm and blues while skewering hip-hop, another could love Mystikal but hate Nelly. Everything in critique is entirely subjective, except for one very key element: everything isn't one way or the other. Everything isn't good, and everything isn't bad.

It just isn't possible.

No, there is a great subtlety in the quality of music, some of it being quite good, some it being quite bad, and some of it being squarely in the middle. But popular critics have apparently lost the ability to truly say either of the extremes, instead reviewing almost everything as being truly in the middle. This is problematic at best, dishonest at worst.

Why?

Critics are one of society's best defenses against creative trash, be it the quality of the work or its content. There are few ways to know about the quality of an album with the exception of critics or the actual ability to listen to an album. Hearing it someplace else is obviously the best possible way, but in lieu of that, reviews can be a pretty sure bet.

At least, they could be.

Like all of the different ways that art can be created, there are countless ways to critique it. Regardless of the method used, however, critique must be critical.

But that seems to be inexplicably missing in recent years when it comes to analytical takes on music. It is the most important and accessible of all forms of art, being the one that can be taken and enjoyed almost anywhere. We sing in the shower, we listen on the road, we hear while we jog and we experience while we relax. Yet, for all of the places that we allow music to enter our lives, it seems to have become the least criticized art that we frequently ingest.

Rather than being approached critically, our music is reviewed with kid gloves made of seal fur. Reviewers continually praise what they consider positive, yet fail to point out any aural shortcomings.

These raves just can't be real; Rolling Stone has declared almost 60 percent of the albums they review to be good or slightly better. 60 percent! There's absolutely no way that two thirds of what we listen to is good.

Critics can review albums in one of two ways: against other work of the band in question or against a musical genre. Either way, there just ain't no way that 60 percent of the music being reviewed today is good or better. It isn't possible. Listening to the radio, one doesn't hear two of out every three songs that is satisfying.

Let's use the previously mentioned Rolling Stone as our primary example of the problem with modern critique, both on the fundamental band-versus-itself style and the band-versus-its-genre style.

Wu-Tang's first album Enter the Wu-Tang: 36 Chambers was critically acclaimed. It was praised as a brilliant fusion of art and philosophy, a rebirth of sorts for a musical style, hip-hop, that had suffered without ongoing development. Enter the Wu was that development, a creative kick in the pants. Other albums developed around their style; artists explored not just a world of women and

Award winning Ellis Paul brings a new generation of folk to Iron Horse

Ellis Paul, one of the new generation of east coast folk artists, will be performing at the Iron Horse this Friday night, promoting his newly released two-disc live album Live, which, while dominated by solo acoustic performances, also includes guest collaborators such as Patty Griffin and Chris Trapper of The Push Stars.

"I've done pretty well here in Boston over the years because I got a lot of airplay, but heading out on the road I had developed the fan base person by person," he told the Collegian, having just returned from a nation-wide tour. "I got the play the entire country from coast to coast. I'm really enjoying it," he said, adding, "People are a little bit more jaded out here. In the Midwest, though, you start getting people who are really happy to see you, because they don't get a lot of shit coming their way."

Boston has always been a stronghold for the Maine native, having won ten Boston Music Awards in the past five years; he also enjoys a position of some prestige within the new crop of acoustic singer/songwriters. "I've been doing it for about eight years. I feel like I've really been supported by that community of people in a great way."

This is not, however, to pin Paul as merely another guy with a guitar; his albums make use of full-band textures and although he will be appearing solo at the Iron Horse, he made use of a three-piece band while touring this fall.

About his anti-folk leanings, he said, "I want to be true to what the song calls for. If it wants to be amped up with electric guitars and background vocals, then that's what I'll do."

Carving out his own sound in between the worlds of folk and rock has, however, made it difficult at times for him to get a commercial foot in the door. "It puts me as a little bit of square peg in the folk world. So, getting airplay in the folk world might be difficult. And they're not purely rock albums, so I'm not getting a lot of commercial rock airplay.

Nine Inch Nails 'Fall Apart' with inconsistent remixes

RONI SIZE/REPRAZENT
In the Mode
Island

"Railing Pt. 2" jumps out of the speakers like an electronica call to arms, recalling that pulse-jolting energy that this Bristol crew brought with their seminal debut New Forms. Or so I'm told. Crucify me if you will, but I've never heard New Forms in its entirety, only pieces of it, and I remember seeing the "Brown Paper Bag" video once, which was cool. So, while I'm not the hardened drum 'n bass solider that may give In the Mode the desired perspective, I can certainly enjoy the merits of a good album, and a collective with this much talent and energy is hard to ignore. And when Dynamite MC raps about "one more bass, and one more rhyme," I know better than to believe him. In the Mode isn't close to the end; it's creating a new beginning.

As it Size's frantic, shifting beats weren't good enough, the album is insistent on keeping the proceedings fresh and ensuring that the listener doesn't settle on any one style. "Lucky Pressure," a beautiful track with vocals from Onallee, mixes some of the gloss soul of Basement Jaxx with unwaveringly rigid beats. The sleek hip-hop track "Who Told You?" is the rare track on the album where the mainstream might actually take notice; its erratic sing-a-long chorus more of a challenge or boast than a question. The guest stars on the album are all game, but the tracks aren't completely successful. With Zack De La Rocha we get too much 18 minutes worth), with Rahzel we get too little, but Method Man's "Ghetto Celebrity" is just right, with typically stellar rhymes and MZA's voice coasting nicely over the jagged drums. And whether it is "Mexican" or "Idi Banashapun," the instrumentals always sound urgent and forceful, like every track has something to prove, and it makes for great music. Always exciting, In the Mode is the work of inspired professionals at the top of their game, but far from complacent. (Michael Delano)

Various City Rocks Boston
Bands.com

City Rocks is a good idea, and featuring Boston, easily one of the most rocking cities in America, is even better. Released by Bands.com, City Rocks Boston is fifteen tracks of pure balls to wall rock.

Except that there's no Aerosmith, inexplicably left off the album except for the band's guitarist Joe Perry and his side project, The Joe Perry Project. Oh, sure, the Mighty Mighty Bosstones rock a little bit, but there just ain't no comparison with a "Love in an Elevator" or "Dude Looks Like a Lady."

However, it should be noted that, despite the lack of Aerosmith, the rest of the album has enough rock to hold water, notably with little-remembered hits like "Spirit in the Sky" by Norman Greenbaum and "Roadrunner" by Jonathan Richman and the Modern Lovers.

By featuring the littler guys, Bands.com shows how Boston hasn't just influenced the music world with their major acts, but also with the secondary rockers who maybe only sniffed the top of the charts.

But what about those Boston bands that made it to the top of the charts? Yeah, they're here too. The Cars, I Getls Band, Morphine, Extreme and, of course, Boston, are the big-time talent on this album. Boston's "More Than a Feeling," Extreme's "More Than Words," and Morphine's "Buena" are great hits that truly fit on this album.

Apparently, there are others in this collection that I wasn't sent, including one for Canada (a single perhaps?) and one for New York. Collecting all three is probably having a solid collection of northeastern singles.

Honestly, though, the album is a little bit cheesy, but if cheddar's sour thing, than this album is a sure winner. It is sappily sweet and that isn't so bad for most of the time. (Sam Wilkinson)

MERLE HAGGARD
If I Could Only Fly
Anti-

You don't have to be a former cocaine user or addict to feel what Merle Haggard is saying on "Wishing All These Old Things Were New." He's "watching while some old friends do a line/ Holding back the want to end my own addicted mind," but that isolated act, like his kids telling him to quit smoking just illustrates Haggard's misty reminiscence of days gone by. The simple enunciation of the lyrics and gravity of his voice is so genuine and expressive that one not only sympathizes, but also relates the universal theme to their own life. Merle Haggard has experienced more in his life than many people will, but undoubtedly listeners can find something to relate to in the many experiences the country legend relates throughout If I Could Only Fly. Even if you can't relate to the situation, or find meaning in the lyrics, Haggard has a way of expressing the emotion behind the song simply through his heartfelt delivery.

Which is not to say that the lyrics aren't poignant and direct. "I'm Still Your Daddy" finds Haggard writing about his daughter finding out about his time in San Quentin prison. He knew when she found out "her heart would break" and her "faith would go away," but begs "don't put me down/ Don't push me away" with not so much regret as acceptance. "Leaving's Getting Harder" doesn't apologize for wanting to be at home, relaxed, with family, but approaches the calm new life tepidly and with a sense of defeated nostalgia for the wilder days of the past. It's easy to find a connection to much of what is on If I Could Only Fly, and while I could live without the more carefree "Crazy Moon" and "Honky Tonky Mama," brief levity from the personal and sometimes depressing subject matter will no doubt be welcome to some. Far from the cesspool of commercial country radio, Merle's music has the refreshing feel that somebody would get beaten with a whalebone before he bended to any current trend, and the exclusion of hampering outside forces allows him to be that much more inclusive in the honesty of his songs. NINE INCH NAILS
Things Falling Apart
Nothing Records

After five years of silence following The Downward Spiral, Trent Reznor and NIN returned with The Fragile, a critically lauded double album demonstrating both Reznor's progressing subtlety and maturity, and his continued devotion to angry, goth-flavored techno. And now, a year after that, he has released Things Falling Apart, a ten-track album sporting three new songs and seven remixes of Fragile tracks.

Perhaps it's because of the timid length, and perhaps it's because of all of the collaborations Reznor undertook, but Things Falling Apart lacks the vision and cohesion of its parent album. It is, in feel if not in fact, a collection of b-sides and outtakes, experimental in the "hey, we haven't tried this combination of sound effects before" manner and in that way extremely hit-or-miss.

Not surprisingly (and further compressing the album's scope), three of the remixes are of "Starfuckers Inc." The Fragile's biggest single. The first is awful, the second is solid, and the third is such an imposing heap of techno that I can't begin to pass judgment on it. Perhaps it's the song's too-typical NIN sound, but it seems difficult to justify the amount of attention the song received on an album already wanting for length, especially when the newly released, unremixed tracks are the album's strongest, making one wonder how many other worthwhile tracks may be sitting on some shelf in Reznor's basement while he hands out an album that's almost 1/3 "Starfuckers" remixes.

Of these new tunes, by the best are "Slipping Away" and "The Great Collapse" (aren't NIN song titles great? I love'em); they're standard NIN fare, but in an album populated largely by songs remixed without the oversight of Reznor, the locus and experience he brings to electronica becomes a valuable commodity.

Things Falling Apart is not The Fragile; it isn't even close. Devoted NIN fans shouldn't hesitate if only for the unreleased Fragile tracks, but the album is too inconsistent to make it a necessary purchase for general techno fans. (David Troupes)

THE CHEMICAL BROTHERS
Music Response EP (US Edition)
Astralwerks

One thing The Chemical Brothers can never be accused of is not having a good time. And they're happy to let you know how happy they are through their music. Whether it is a party anthem like "Block Rockin' Beats" or trippy psychedelic fare like "Under the Influence," the brothers are gonna work it out, have a party, and you're invited.

EPs released in between albums can be a blessing or a curse. If it's just a rehash of old material with shoddy presentation and a fat sticker price to tide fans over until the next album, it's entirely throwaway. But like purveyors of quality EP material like Primus and Dan the Automator, the Bros. craft a worthwhile package at a decent price that shows more appreciation for the fans than lusting after dollar signs. The Music Response EP features the title track from their Surrender album, two remixes of the song, two live tracks, and two unreleased tracks. It adds up to 48 minutes of music, and also features a barebones enhanced portion where the (not-hard to find) video for "Let Forever Be" is showcased in addition to Bros. track commentary and photos.

"Music Response" is a great track, sounding like an Atari game on crack, but the extras are why anyone cares, and they are satisfying for the most part. "Freak of the Week" is submitted by the Bros. as just a collection of cool beats they never incorporated into their songs, and while confirming their good taste, doesn't feel whole or continuous. "Enjoy" is more traditional (track time: 8min 8sec@808 clever), with a Middle Eastern-sounding string sample straight from the Surrender studio sessions. The remixes are solels for the die-hards, as they are both fine but unnecessary. The Gentleman Thief version is the better of the two, not very compelling but slick and professional. "Out of Control" live from Glastonbury 2000 is far out and genuinely exciting, and the four minute "Get Guilt" live version shows the most restraint of anything on the album, providing an elegant cool down before bringing the EP to a climbing, distorted close. More of a recap and cutting room floor sweep-up of the Surrender sessions than an essential pick for casual fans, completists should nonetheless find much to like here while the rest will wait patiently for the next full-length. As year winds down, new season of television still remains unoriginal and exceedingly disappointing

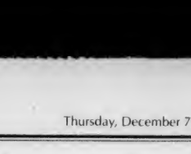
This has been one of the most disappointing television seasons ever, mostly because of all the sludge that has survived that should have been cut. The only two big-name shows that were canceled from NBC were Oliver Platt's "Deadline" and some cheap "Malcolm in the Middle" ripoff that I can't even remember the name of. And, although these two shows were bad, they were not godawful, unlike some of the crap that is on right now. There are so many terriable shows that can be replaced with a special episode of "The Drew Carey Show," or even, for instance, a more "Survivor."

I am still flabbergasted when I think about the cancellation of "SportsNight," "Working," and "Alf" and then I wonder how some of this season's shows can still be on the air. First of all, CBS's "Bette" needs to be cancelled and cancelled fast. Besides the fact that the best shows on CBS were "All in the Family" and "Picket Fences," both of which never got a proper sendoff after all the money that brought to the company, "Bette" is just a boring show. An ex-diva tries to sort out a new career while being an active member of her family. It sounds boring, so how could it be good? All good shows have a better show synopsis than that. "Frasier," for instance, is about a psychologist who moves to Seattle to start his own radio show and moves in with his injured working class dad, his father's physical therapist, and his father's dog. Now that sounds funny. It's a wacky cast of characters. He is upper class and his father is working class, so it doesn't get any better than the discussion about whether to have sloppy joes or caviar for dinner or to watch the opera or the Mariners. This is not even mentioning that "Fraiser"'s head is the proper size for his body, while Bette's head probably ways more than her entire body. Plus, "Bette"'s just not funny. What's that? Bette was dancing with the Lakers girls? So what, so did Paula Abdul. Bette jumped on one of those nautilus machines and didn't know what to do? So did my dad. I would rather see "Survivor" than watch her.



This is the part where I would talk about the NBC sitcom "Geena," but I've ranted and raved enough about it and honestly it would be the same hate-based babble that I just gave Bette Midler's show.

Now I have to do something I hate to do, which is talk badly about NBC. I have always been an NBC fan but this new show "Cursed" is terrible. I had high hopes for it basically because of Steven Weber and Chris Elliot, but then I saw that Annie from "Caroline in the City" is in it, plus the writing is horrendous. The show is called "Cursed" and yes, he does get cursed, but only in the first episode. After that it's just about how his life is now nothing like it was. It just has no meaning whatsoever.

I hope Evgeh Finkel does not die on "Boston Public"; he is one of the reasons that I started watching David E. Kelley's new yellow notepad hit.

And how about "ER", oh my god, this season has been a roller coaster. I hate to give it aways to those who haven't seen it for awhile, but you should get back into it. I'm not quite sure if I like the changes but only time will tell. However, I do like how they now show the program in widescreen format, you get more of a film feeling to the show.

What to Watch

Not only brand new "ER" and "ED" but also Ed Norton on "The Simpsons." Enjoy. The next time I talk about current television we'll be on the verge of the XFL.

money, but rather, entire worlds. Everything was explored and while we are still burdened by bad rap (Nelly, for example), bands have felt free; rap has become more creative. Or perhaps it has remained the same, but there are some better albums out there.

Whatever the reality, it was the epitome of a four star album, and in a few years when somebody can critically look back at how hip-hop changed as a result of that album, it might be a five star album.

Their most recent album, W, was similarly given four stars. Not one critic has praised it as brilliant. In fact, most called it horribly uneven. Nobody has suggested that it, like its predecessor, it will redefine a musical genre. And listening to it, one hopes it won't. It just isn't good enough.

Yet Rolling Stone claimed that both albums, in the most basic of ways, star ratings, were the exact same. To do that is to not only take away from the quality of Wu's first release but essentially to lie about the quality of the latter. Claiming that the third album Wu released must somehow be as good as their first one is to lessen the importance and impact of the first album, almost as if to say that this most recent album is interchangeable with the band's first.

It isn't.

W just isn't as good as Enter the Wu. Nobody thinks so, but Wu is getting lucky when it comes to getting four star ratings from lax critics who seem to be critiquing based solely on the name of the band, a band known for producing good hip-hop; these critics could (read: should) critique against either the quality of the Wu's earlier work (W wouldn't stand up) or against the hip-hop genre, at which point very high or positive ratings are even, or should be anyway, harder to come by. But first, a side note. Consider Pink Floyd's Dark Side of the Moon, an unbelievable album, a critical success and perhaps the most successful record of all time. A latter release, The Division Bell, was critically skewered because it just didn't stand up to Floyd's own very high standards. It is similar with W. It just wasn't as good. Bell wasn't good because Pink Floyd did it, despite its being a decent album. It works similarly for W. It is a decent album, just not a good Wu-Tang album.

Because competing against one is much easier than competing against the greats. If W or The Division Bell has to try to hold their own against the brilliance of some albums, they can't do it. The groups that produced those albums could, but not these albums.

That's the subtlety that critics seem to miss. Great groups can produce subpar work, and if they do, they must be reviewed as such. There are no bonus stars for simply being creative on a few albums. There are no kindness points for bad albums. It just isn't honest. W isn't a four star album, it isn't groundbreaking and it won't redefine the genre as their last four star album did. The Division Bell is a fine album, but it can't be classed with Dark Side of the Moon. It isn't even close.

We shouldn't expect our bands to produce continually great work, but we similarly can't just take of the gloves when it comes to dealing with those albums. All great artists make mistakes. Against the previous releases or against the genre, some albums by great bands don't stand up. These things happen and we should critique them as such.

Though inspirational through metal, Factory 81 simply cannot be N'Sync

Mankind
Mojorecords

Many of you dedicated Collegian readers may know me from my music reviews of Christina Aguilera, 2gether, and 98 Degrees. However, the days of me writing articles about this worthless kind of fluff music are over. This is due to the fact that I was recently held at gunpoint by Music Editor Mike Delano, who threatened my life if I reviewed another "crap" album. He told me it is time for me to stop writing drivel and start writing art. Therefore, I have chosen to review the new album Mankind by the metal group Factory 81.

Eager to bring a new sound to the Detroit metal scene, Factory 81 was formed roughly two years ago. Consisting of Andy (drums) Kevin (bass), Bill (guitar), and Nathan (vocals), the quartet possesses a heavy sound, with "an undertone of new school hardcore." Influenced by the likes of Earthcrisis, Hatebreed, and Strife, Factory 81 serves up a hearty helping of angst with a side of nothing else. Chracterized by heavy guitar riffs and in-your-face lyrics that will probably scare small children and old ladies, the tracks on Mankind are like a kick in the teeth, or a brick to the back of the head, or maybe like getting shot in the face.

Although sometimes a bit abstract, for the most part Factory 81 is easy to understand: they are bunch of pissed off dudes. Political Statements abound on Mankind. They show no love at all for law enforcement in "Police Officer," the album's champion track about, as one might expect, being harassed by police officers. Racism and Nazism in particular are ripped to shreds in "Belligerence." Religion is the target in "Sludge." And "Diary of a Serial Killer" is about a serial killer that is writing a diary, I guess, but I couldn't hear what the guy was saying expect for "ARRRRRRRR." "You'll never fuck me," and "MRRRAAAWWW." Seriously, Nathan's vocals sound frightening and demonic. I was scared. To a novice (not me, of course), most of the tracks sound a heck of a lot like the one before it. But, if you like your music hard and heavy without apologies you'll like this album.

I think it's safe to say Mankind makes me want to get in the pit and try to love someone. No more hip-hop and pop music for me, now, thanks to this album, I'm all about the hardcore metal. My new plan is to pierce my body and dedicate my entire life to metal. I can't wait to go a metal concert, get in the mosh pit, and get the absolute crap kicked out of me. I can't wait to have someone elbow me as hard as they can in the face, then maybe take a steel chair or maybe even a brick and beat me upside the head. Then, maybe, if I'm lucky I can even get powerbombed through a wooden table. At the end of the night, after taking a severe beating, I will look at myself in the mirror and vomit all over my disgusting carcass.

UMass looks to knock UConn off the block

Men go for back-to-back wins

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Hot on the heels of an impressive 239-127 victory over Syracuse last weekend, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team returns to action on Saturday afternoon at Connecticut. The Minutemen will look to improve to 5-2 by knocking off the Huskies for the third consecutive year. Last year, UMass knocked off UConn 141-90 here in Amherst and will look to repeat its performance when they travel to Storrs.

In order for UMass to make it three in a row against the Huskies, it will need another strong performance from senior Chris Arsenault. On Wednesday, Arsenault was named the Atlantic 10 men's swimming and diving Performer of the Week for his performance against Syracuse.

Last weekend against the Orangemen, Arsenault garnered eight first place finishes, set two individual pool records in the 200-yard individual medley and the 100-yard freestyle and also helped set three relay team pool records in the 400 medley, 200 freestyle and the 800 freestyle.

The highlight of the weekend for the Minutemen was a school record in the 200-yard medley relay. The team of senior Billy Brown, junior transfer Ryan Fisher, sophomore Ryan Zaucha and Arsenault finished with a time of 1:32.94, knocking almost a half-second off the previous mark set three years ago.

Also coming up big against 'Cuse last weekend was freshman diver Logan Alomar. In the three-meter dive competition, Alomar notched the second best score in UMass history. Alomar's total of 303.55 was good enough to put him in the NCAA Zone Qualifier. In total, against the Orangemen the Minutemen won 14 events and set seven Joseph R. Rogers, Jr. Pool records.

If the Minutemen hope to repeat the success of last weekend Alomar, Arsenault and the rest of the Minutemen will have to be on the top of their game. The Huskies come in with a record of 5-2 and placed well in the 400-yard freestyle relay and the 400 medley relay in this past weekend's U.S. Open Championships in Auburn, Ala.

Senior Sarah Newell and the rest of the women's swim and dive team will attempt to upend UConn this weekend when they travel to Storrs.

Relays anchor women

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Think of a word used to describe the feeling Massachusetts has for Connecticut: loath...no, detest... better still, hate... well, let's just say that nobody likes UConn.

Beating the tar out of the Huskies is as much a UMass tradition as Bowl Day and the Haigh Hoopla, so motivation will not be a problem for the Minutewomen in this Saturday's swimming and diving matchup.

Coming off a 240-150 loss to the Syracuse Orangewomen, UMass now stands at 5-1 on the season.

The Minutewomen bring an undefeated road record into Storrs, CT for a noon meet with their archrivals.

Freshman Christen Dexter has been a pleasant surprise for the Maroon and White this season. Her consistency and success has been a welcome addition to the squad.

Dexter set a UMass record in the 200-yard breaststroke against Syracuse last weekend. She'll now look to continue that success against the Huskies.

The core of the Maroon and White's strength emanates from the outstanding junior class led by Andrea Kazanjian, Becky Hunnewell and Anne Dettloff.

Kazanjian holds Atlantic 10 best times in both the 50-yard freestyle and the 100-yard freestyle.

Hunnewell's specialty lies in the backstroke, where her 200-yard time of 2:06.16 is tops in the conference.

Dettloff has picked up where her teammates left off by competing well in the longer distance freestyle events.

The three juniors team with sophomore Lauren Bulkeley to form a dangerous 400-yard freestyle relay team. The quartet entered the record books last Saturday when they set a Joseph R. Rogers Jr. pool record with a time of 3:33.51.

Kate Allery has been the diving leader for the Minutewomen all season and should continue to do so against the UConn squad.

The keys to victory for the Maroon and White will lie in the performance of the junior class and its highly touted relay teams.

UMass holds the conference's top times in three of the five relay events while placing second and fourth in the other two. If the relay teams perform the way they are capable of and the juniors continue to set the pace, then someone will need to throw the Huskies a life preserver.

Wife or no wife, carry your woman

Wife Carrying

We have an old friend here in "Third and 48" land. He's smart, funny and is one of the most creative individuals in the five-college area. Larry at Adults Only Video in Hadley thrusts an incredible wealth of knowledge and spews miraculous pizzazz. We recently called Larry because we needed some insight on a sport so crazy, only a man of superior intellect could analyze it.

Wife carrying, now an international event, has taken the world by storm. In the sport, a man must run around a 253.5 meter track made of sand, grass and water, carrying his or someone else's wife for a woman who is not a wife at all) until they reach the end.

The first couple to finish wins many prizes, including the wife's weight in beer. Last year, the Estonian team of Imre Ambos and Anneli Ojaste won a television and 98 pints of beer when they found victory in the World Championships.

The rules state that the woman/wife must be at least 17 years of age and if the man drops the woman, the team is penalized by fifteen seconds. The idea was sparked from hundreds of years ago, when men would steal women from neighboring villages.

"That's an attempt at putting the best possible face on an ugly situation," Larry explained. "It commemorates a time when we were morons. It's a little dubious."

Larry then indicated that the people of the world are simply too naive for their own good.

"I think sometimes we forget where things come from," he pointed out. "It's like that saying 'rule of thumb.' That saying comes from a time when you could beat your wife with a stick as long as the stick is the size of your thumb."

Larry explained that the event is simply another horrible way of men displaying their ability to lug around women simply for show. "Doesn't that say something about society," he pondered. "It sounds to me like the woman is getting a free ride."

Larry elucidated that he would be very bad at this sport. "I can't imagine myself trying to carry a woman," he said. "Lose fifteen seconds? Hell, I might as well forget it. I'd be backed up to the year 2010!"

The year 2010 might be far away, but Adults Only Video is not. The conversation started some sort of a controversy in the shop. When Larry said, "Sounds to me like the woman is getting a free ride," a woman in the store yelled out, "Women never get a free ride. You have to do the cooking, cleaning and everything else." That woman was Larry's wife.

Amazingly enough, after he said that, he looked at a customer standing in front of him. "We have a customer here, who says he's from Sweden. He's paying a late fee on a video. I guess it was really good."

The name of the video that the customer was returning was Run Away (though the stars of the video did not run away with their co-stars on their backs), and Larry claimed it has a storyline. "When I say anything down here has a storyline, I'm kind of pushing the envelope anyway," he said. "It starts as a story and then goes into what it's supposed to do."

If you've made it this far in the column, then you're probably interested in training for the 2001 World Championship in Sonkajarvi, Finland on July 14th.

This is why we bring you the column "Third and 48" each and every week. We want you to be better informed of the competitions of the world. And we want you to get involved.

So we called Craig.

Craig is a physical trainer at Total Fitness, Inc. located on Westfield Road in Holyoke.

"A lot of people think we're a gym," Craig said. But he said that's not true. Total Fitness just sells training products and stuff, so don't go there if you have your heart set on sweating your ass off.

If you want to do that, then start training for the 2001 Wife Carrying World Championships.

"If I was to train for that then I would carry a sack or a punching bag on my back to simulate how much your wife would weigh," Craig said. "Plus, it takes a lot of endurance so you should do a lot of track running.

"Drape her around your back," he continued. "This distributes the pressure over a larger surface area."

Though Larry from the porn store, unlike Craig from the gym, did not seem very supportive of the sport, he did make a very lucrative deal. "I'll make an offer here in the states," he said. "Adults Only Video will give the winner a free video rental of their choice." And what athlete would not want that remarkable prize? Forget the Olympic gold medal.

Class: Senior Major: Sport Management
DOB: 7/13/77
Age: 23
Zodiac Sign: Cancer
Hometown: Cranston, RI
Favorite Food: Chicken, Pizza and Pasta
Favorite Junk Food: Peanut M&M's any candy
Favorite TV Show: Jackass
Favorite Movies: Goodfellas, Rudy, Rocky IV and Billy Madison
Favorite Vacation Spot: Hamilton, Bermuda
Favorite Class: Marketing 301
Favorite Professor: Thomas Brashear
Favorite Type of Music: Rap, but pretty much everything
What would you save in a fire: My dog, Buddy, and my bonsai tree, Earl
Are you a righty or a lefty: Righty, but I play hockey with my left
Describe a funny experience at UMass: Playing with the intercom at the Milwaukee airport. We had an eight-hour layover and we were getting bored, so we found a way to amuse ourselves.
Career Ambition: Go to business school; be a Secret Service Agent; coach youth hockey
Sports Rituals: Take ice-cold baths for five to ten minutes the morning of a game and be one of the DJs in the locker room

Growing up just south of Providence, Jay Shaw started playing hockey when he was four years old and has loved the game ever since.

He has always been a team player, participating in baseball and football as a child, and he plans on keeping it that way by joining the Secret Service. He is currently in the interviewing process.

"I like the camaraderie of [the Secret Service] because it's like one big team," said Shaw. "I like the prestige of it. Everything about it is attractive. The only bad thing is that it will be tough on family life."

He also wants to continue his education by going to business school and earn his degree in marketing. With that degree, he plans on joining a big marketing agency to market sports, among other things.

Although this will be his last year playing collegiate hockey, he does not want it to be the end.

"I still want to try and pursue hockey professionally, but I have to be realistic," he said. "I'm not going to play in the NHL, but I'm going to give it a shot, maybe play in Europe or the minor leagues."

During the summer, Shaw works at hockey schools with the coach of the Providence Bruins, a practice that he loves.

"This past summer I ran a clinic for a high school team," he explained. "I taught them for an hour on the ice and an hour on the track. They just hated me after that, but hopefully they benefited from it."

When he's not playing hockey, Shaw likes to hang out with the guys on the team. And he has plenty of time to do that since he lives with four other players.

"When we're bored, instead of watching TV, we'll just sit on the couches and make fun of each other," laughed Shaw. "But it's all in good nature."

Shaw's younger brother, Justin, also plays for the Minutemen, and Jay is glad for the time he has spent here with his brother.

"Playing with my brother and going to school with him was a great experience," he said. "We're going to have so many stories to laugh about at family holidays for the rest of our lives."

Horoscopes

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Give yourself more credit! You've accomplished much recently, and you have what it takes to accomplish more in little time.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – What happens today is likely to have a resounding impact on the future, so be sure you know just what is going on and why. Heed warnings!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – What is it about danger that appeals to you so much? Answer this question and you'll be able to make better decisions across the board.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – A surprise contact from a friend or loved one is going to put you on the right track in search of something you think you cannot do without.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Common sense will win the day for you – but there will be times when you must break with tradition, follow your instincts, and experiment.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – That which appears most attainable to you as the day opens may prove to be quite distant when the time comes. You must work harder!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may not be the one with all the ideas today, and you must be willing to let someone else take over if he or she is on a creative roll.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may receive two or more offers at once today, and you'll have to choose between them if you wish to take full advantage of either.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You will surely have to make minor adjustments all day long, so keep your eyes and ears open at all times. You don't want to get trapped!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Your progress will have to be measured in smaller increments today – but you will surely make progress, nonetheless. Seek out assistance.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – A daring decision on your part may surprise those around you today, but you're likely to win a great deal of admiration when all is said and done.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Common sense is indispensable today. You must be willing to see things from an organic, instinctive point of view – and judge well.

Minutemen look to silence their critics

Crooks leads charge against PC Friars

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

A mere four games into the season, followers of the Massachusetts men's basketball team are already starting to get nervous.

They are pointing to three straight road losses against beatable teams. They are scrutinizing the stat sheets and finding disturbing trends. They are speaking in not-so-hushed tones about a need to shuffle the lineup, bench players, and even shake up the coaching staff.

Guard Shannon Crooks has a few words of warning for these fans.

"If you start hitting the panic button this early, you're going to be hitting it all season long with every loss," Crooks said. "Sure, we could use a little boost right now after a tough couple of games. But it's way too early to start panicking."

The Minutemen (1-3) will look for that boost tonight when Providence invades the William D. Mullins Center for the first time ever. UMass Coach James "Bruiser" Flint views the outcome of this game as important to his players' psyche, as they have done a lot of positive things on the court this season with very little to show for it.

"We need a win because we need to get some confidence," Flint said. "We've been playing hard; we just need to get some results."

Revenge could also be a motivating force against the Friars (4-3). The Minutemen ventured into the Providence Civic Center last season and came up a point short in a wild overtime thriller, 61-60. UMass forward Winston Smith hit a clutch jumper to send the game into OT, and Friar David Murray finished off the Minutemen by scooping up a loose ball and laying it in with 15 seconds on the clock.

The two teams combined for 36 turnovers over the course of the game, and UMass shot a woeful 32.4 percent from the field.

"I just watched the tape from last year, and it was one of the ugliest games," Flint said. "But both teams played hard."

Tonight's showdown marks the start of a killer stretch for the Maroon and White, which faces five different opponents over a span of 11 days. The team will follow up tonight's action by getting back on the road to duel Ohio State, Connecticut and Boston University. The stretch concludes when UMass hosts Boston College next Friday.

Depending on whom you ask, UMass' roundball mini-marathon could be either a blessing or a curse for the struggling team.

"I'm looking forward to this stretch," Crooks said. "With this many games this close together, we'll get a real feel for the game. You can make adjustments from game to game instead of making the same mistakes over and over. I wouldn't have it any other way."

"Nobody ever needs five games in 11 days," Flint said. "We've just got to go out and play."

UMass' dark 91-76 defeat last weekend in Oregon was not without a silver lining. The team shot 49 percent from the field, a marked improvement over its 32.8 percent outing the weekend before against Holy Cross.

Shooting guard Monty Mack racked up 20 first-half points on his way to a game-high and season-best 26. Center Micah Brand exploded for a career-high 19 points, while falling just short of his career-high in caroms with nine.

Brand's transformation into a paint punisher came after Crooks urged him to put away his hesitation and play like he practices: all out.

"I told Micah during that game, 'If you get the ball 1-on-1, don't stop and think, just take it straight to them.' Once he did that and got some confidence, I think he even surprised himself," Crooks said.

There may be more to Brand's breakout performance than just motivational talks from his point guard. Flint has employed the help of Dr. Ron Carr, a sports psychologist, to assist in Brand's development. Carr has worked with NBA centers Alonzo Mourning, Hakeem Olajuwon and Patrick Ewing in the past, and has implemented the same plan with Brand that he did with those greats: wristbands with messages on them to help the young pivot focus during games.

According to Flint, Brand wears two wristbands: ATR (attack the rim) and HU (hands up).

"He went out and had the best game of his career," Flint said. "Something must be up with the wristbands."

Tip-off is slated for 7 pm.

Jesse Greenspun contributed to this story.

Orchard Hill construction begins

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

Students in the Orchard Hill and Central Residence areas will soon face disruptions on their walk to class. Construction has begun to replace the steam pipes running from the Durfee Gardens up to Orchard Hill, which will be closing the walkway behind Health Services.

Ultimately the goal of the construction project, managed by Landscape Architect Bruce Thomas of the Facilities Planning Division, will replace the primary electric feed line from the East Pleasant Street substation. The electric line is in jeopardy of failing because steam is leaking and degrading the insulation that surrounds the electric wires.

"It is critical that the electric line be replaced," Thomas said. "It's sort of a domino effect. We can't replace the electric line unless we fix the steam line first."

The project is slated to take place in about five phases. The first phase is to dig up and replace the steam pipes from the Rhododendron Gardens forward about 200 feet through the parking lot of Health Services.

Phase two will include the excavation of the walkway behind Health Services, which includes the steps and path that is currently lined with wood chips.

Phase three will run from the top of the hill over to the Chancellor's house. According to Thomas, there will be a "great big hole" where they will be working on utilities near the house.

The fourth phase, which will hopefully be completed by May, will be the excavation of the top of Orchard Hill and the parking lot at Fisher Lab.

Thomas also said that there will be a day or two when the Orchard Hill bus route will be interrupted. However, Facilities Planning has already contacted the PVTA and have made plans to run the buses along East Pleasant Street during that time.

The fifth and final phase will be to remove the old electric line and replace it with a new one. This will not require any more construction because the electricity runs through buried conduits.

"That's the easy part," Thomas said. "You'll never see it. The part that's going to be the most visible is going to be the cause of the problem; the steam line."

While the construction is going on, there will be fencing around the torn up areas. There will also be signs directing students which way to walk. However, when the project has been completed, the walkway and stairs behind Health Services will be replaced by asphalt.

"Our biggest concern is the disruption of pedestrian routes," Thomas said. "They will be deflecting for a while, but eventually it will be more convenient for students."

The project will also be installing concrete stairwells with hand railings, which are being designed so that it will be easier for the Grounds crew to maintain.

The construction has been contracted out to All State Oiler and Construction Company and will cost an estimated $1.8 million. The project was designed by the Maguire Group in Foxboro. Facilities Planning has scheduled the construction to be complete by June 2001.

"We're looking at this construction in a positive way," Thomas said. "We will be getting rid of the steam line that is leaking, and also cleaning up any utilities around the President's garden so that we don't ever have to go in there again."

Thomas recognizes that this construction will be a problem for a lot of people and an inconvenience for students. However, he does stress that it is imperative to fix these steam pipes now and also asks the residents of Orchard Hill and Central to be patient and respect the construction areas.

There is also construction going on near Hills North, by the Franklin Dining Commons, but that is unrelated to the steam-replacement project. The school has long-term plans to fix other leaking steam lines in the future.

Soul TV asks how to be a player tonight

By Rachael Devaney
Collegian Staff

Soul TV is bringing the Players Ball 2000, A Perception of the Era, back to the University of Massachusetts tonight to stimulate students' creative ideas on what it's like to be a player.

The last time Soul TV brought the Players Ball to UMass was in 1998, in honor of Aids Awareness. Organizers hope the turnout will be just as good tonight starting at 9 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium where the best-dressed players will be awarded with prizes. Student performers such as Charles Gregg will be featured, as well as rap artist Charlie Knox, out of Triad.

Naeema Arrastia, and Verena Bryan, the co-organizers of this year's Players Ball, want to bring a new and different flavor to UMass, without straining student pockets.

"You're getting a night of good music, and performers," said Arrastia. "It's something different, not the same thing over and over again."

Founded in 1996, the organization's main mission is to promote raw student talent, and in the past, Soul TV has been involved in numerous projects, and won numerous awards for its media efforts. With the collaboration of producing, coordinating, and directing events, Soul TV has had many successful media educational programs such as "Sex and Safety on the UMass Campus," "Communication amongst ALANA students," "What is the Dance Culture?" and "Relationships on Campus."

Depending on how well the Players Ball goes tonight, Soul TV will host its annual fashion show, Sex Appeal for the Millennium, this upcoming Spring, as well as create a collaboration with the English Speaking Caribbean Association (ESCA) for the West Indian Bash and its third annual female football game at the Malcolm X Barbecue.

"It [The West Indian Bash] used to be an annual Soul TV event, and we want to revitalize that in the future," said Bryan. "We want to make it more of a cultural event."

In addition to these activities, the Soul TV Dancers will also be adding their own funk to some of the upcoming UMass basketball games.

"We really like to promote student talent, and the dancers display this," said Bryan.

UMass employees demand back pay

By Jim Welt
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON - More than 30 demonstrators gathered at the University of Massachusetts at Boston campus Wednesday to protest the school's two-day shutdown during the first presidential debate on Oct. 3.

The demonstrators, organized by the UMass Radical Student Alliance, also took aim at what they see as the University's unfair labor practices. Management of UMass' bookstore and dining facilities is contracted to the Sedexo-Mariott corporation, and the company's non-union workers are hired as sub-contractors, thereby receiving few of the same benefits as University employees.

According to faculty member and union organizer Gary Zabel, the closing of the University during the presidential debate harmed both students and these sub-contractors. The students, Zabel said, lost two days of school they had already paid for and the workers lost two days' pay when they were forced to take unpaid sick leave or vacation time. Those workers who did not take time off were docked pay for those two days.

"[The workers] paid for an event at which the rich and wealthy got to display themselves publicly... People who sat at that debate do not work in the kitchen here," Zabel said. "These are not people who make a great deal of money. You're talking about the working poor."

"They are struggling to pay the same amount of expenses as last month, only with less money," said Dianne Dujon, a protester and UMass staff member.

Zabel called the University's outsourcing of labor a "classic ploy" to avoid providing benefits for its workers.

He also rejected the University's claim that the shutdown was necessary for security, pointing out that when President Bill Clinton visited UMass two years before, the school remained open.

Few of the protesters who marched in the freezing cold at the Quinn Administration Building were employees of Sedexo-Mariott; Zabel said the workers were "keeping undercover" to avoid retribution by their employers.

"It's a sad truth that American workers are often fired for organizing," Zabel said.

After picketing for a half hour, the protesters moved into the administration building to present Vice Chancellor David McKenzie with a 1,200-signature petition. In addition to back wages for University workers and a charter of University worker's rights, the petition demanded the University make reparations for shutting down classes already paid for by donating "several hundred thousand dollars" to fund onsite child care.

The protesters had selected a group of four people to negotiate with the administration. However, when McKenzie walked into the room, he met 30 students, faculty members and labor organizers.

The situation quickly became a tense verbal free-for-all when McKenzie said the debate had helped create jobs at the University during the two days it was closed.

"There was plenty of work for them," McKenzie said, adding that, "everybody who should be paid was paid."

The protesters argued that although there was work available at the debates, none of it went to the cafeteria workers because the cafeteria was closed.

When McKenzie protested that the University couldn't meet the protesters' demands due to financial hardship caused by the debates and the passage of ballot Question 4, one of the student protesters suggested the vice chancellor take a pay cut. Others pointed out that the vice chancellor was a member of a union, while the cafeteria workers were not.

"I hope you get a cut in salary. I want to see you suffer like these workers suffered," said Dermot Doyne, a UMass student and union organizer.

McKenzie pointed out that the cafeteria and bookstore workers are not employees of the University. McKenzie added that these employees all make the prevailing wage. The protesters responded that the prevailing wage is under $10 an hour.

"You're saying the prevailing wage isn't a living wage?" McKenzie asked.

After a half hour of argument, McKenzie agreed to meet with representatives of the student protesters at an unspecified future date and left.

Asked if he was satisfied with the result, Ben Day, one of the representatives of the protesters said, "I was horrified."

Report indicates Mass. tuitions too high

By Crystal Bozek
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON - Massachusetts public and private colleges and universities received high marks in nearly all categories in a national report on higher education released last week by the National Center for Public Policy and Higher Education.

Except for tuition.

The center gave Massachusetts "A" and "A-" for student preparedness for college, the percentage of students who go to college directly after high school and the percentage who earn degrees.

Despite those high ratings, the Center gave Massachusetts a "D" in affordability. The report attacked the Bay State for its high tuition bills and for offering low levels of financial aid to low-income students attending private universities. These students account for 61 percent of enrollment.

The Board of Higher Education insists education is more affordable now, due to a 12.7 percent reduction in tuition for public schools over the past five years. The decrease is a result of the efforts of the Commonwealth and the Board.

Board members also said the state has provided $69 million in financial aid to students -- an 85 percent increase since 1995 -- in a statement issued after the Measuring Up 2000 report was released.

According to Board members, the report is not clear enough.

"They combined public and private colleges, which is why you see the D," said Cynthia Buccini, a representative of the Board of Higher Education.

The report does not differentiate between public and private colleges in the issue of affordability, Board members argued. They also claim the tuition data used is not current and does not represent the improvement that the Commonwealth has made over the last five years.

"The more important story is anyone who wants to go to college in Massachusetts can afford it," said Board Chairman Stephen Tocco in a press release. "We have a public system that is high-quality, affordable and accessible for everyone."

While the Board argues that public college and university tuition is noticeably decreasing, it also cites that prices at private universities in Massachusetts are skyrocketing and outpacing inflation, while remaining below the national average increase of 5 percent.

In the past year, Boston University tuition has increased by approximately 3.9 percent, and Harvard University costs have increased by 3.5 percent. Tuition at all campuses of the University of Massachusetts, however, has dropped 4.4 percent in the past five years.

Massachusetts is not the only New England state that received a poor affordability grade; every New England state was graded with a "C" or lower on affordability. New Hampshire, Maine and Rhode Island each received an "F," despite succeeding in all other areas.

Big 10 look at grade inflation

By Julie Westfall
Daily Illini (U. Illinois)

(U-WIRE) CHAMPAIGN, Ill. – Indiana University professor Richard Carr knows one professor in his French department who gives out only three grades: A-plus, A and A-minus.

"That's his business," Carr said. "It's nothing that bothers me that much anymore. I'm too old to be bothered by such things."

The University of Illinois is just now becoming bothered by what other Big Ten schools like Indiana have known for years -- students' grades have been increasing steadily for a generation, and no one knows what to do about it.

Grade records show marks have been accelerating at the University since at least the late 1960s, a sobering fact the provost has promised to investigate. Though no well-known study of Big Ten grade inflation exists, formal and informal checks at seven Big Ten schools revealed grade inflation comparable to that at the University. As at the University and around the nation, explanations for increasing high grades within the Big Ten are usually vague, even when the questions are asked by faculty members who believe a 30-year period of rising grade point averages signifies a depressing decline in academic standards.

"There are always a couple people who get up at meetings and argue that there is grade inflation," said Arthur Miller, a Penn State engineering professor. "And there are typically administrators there who argue that the students are better and so the grades are higher."

WHY THE DOG DOESN'T BARK

Though formal discussions about grading happened at most other Big Ten universities, they failed in almost every case to spur change or even produce a consensus that grade inflation is a problem. At Penn State, grade statistics are presented to the faculty senate every year. Even though the reports show GPAs have risen significantly during the last decade, officials say grade inflation is not a real issue. Ten years ago, only about 3 percent of undergraduate students had a perfect 4.0 average. It's now closer to 5 percent.

In 1991, 43.8 percent of Penn State students earned between a 3.0 and 3.99. Now, more than half of Penn State's student body boasts a B average. The number of mediocre C averages went down 8 percent at the same time. Penn State Dean Susan Welch said that although the publishing of grades confirmed fears about higher grade rates, few people are worried enough to make it an issue. She couldn't explain why.

"It's hard to explain why the dog doesn't bark, it just hasn't caught on," she said.

Purdue University professor Scott Mills led a committee last year to study what it calls possible "grade creep." For eight months, the group met once a month to scan lists of average GPAs since 1980, but officially found no reason for concern because the committee's numbers told them GPAs actually declined at Purdue.

"When we were all said and done, we didn't have a lot to say, and as a consequence, we didn't make a big deal out of it," he said.

Mills said Purdue faculty members couldn't even agree on what grade inflation is, and at least one professor complained that the committee didn't examine the most telling grade statistics. The average Purdue GPA in 1997, according to the committee's numbers, was about a 2.78, down from several years in the early 1970s when average GPAs neared 2.9. But grades increased again at Purdue in the 1990s, after they bottomed out at an average 2.68 in 1985. The grade inflation is not as dramatic as other schools, but no one could say why grades are going up again, or if they will stop. So the issue will drop off the radar at Purdue, as it has at other Big Ten schools.

"No one was very enthusiastic about what we found or exactly how to proceed," Mills said. "I would assume at this time it's dead, it's not an issue."

A lot more was said than done about grade inflation at the University of Wisconsin at Madison last year. The university was asked to participate with Duke University when officials there found national grade rates so alarming that they began a national study on a new kind of evaluation intended to balance out bias in grades. Wisconsin opted not to join the study. Discussions on grade inflation continued even after it declined the offer, but policy committees ultimately decided to leave the issue alone.

"It wasn't viewed as something (it) could do much about, and I think (its) impression was that grade inflation is somewhat more severe at other institutions," said Bruce Beck, a Wisconsin policy and planning analyst who gathered the grade statistics last year.

Fourth and a long shot: Staubach and the Navy

The magazine Aviation Week reported recently that former pro quarterback Roger Staubach would likely be named to head up the U.S. Navy should George W. Bush become president.

While the prospect of a former Dallas Cowboy running the Navy seems as unnatural as putting Robert Downey Jr. in charge of the DEA, we at the Daily Collegian feel that the Hall of Fame signal caller would be a perfect fit in the position.

The first and most obvious qualification possessed by Staubach is his history with the Navy: he graduated from the Naval Academy in 1964 and went on to serve four years in the service (one in Vietnam).

But Staubach's military glory was overshadowed by his accomplishments for the Midshipmen on the football field. He completed 67-of-98 passes as a sophomore, earning the top completion percentage in the nation.

As a junior in 1963, Staubach connected on more than 115 completions, nine for touchdowns, en route to the Heisman Trophy as the top college player in the country. He was the fourth junior in the history of the Heisman to capture the award.

As a quarterback Staubach earned the Most Valuable Player award for directing attacks. He completed 12 of 19 passes for 119 yards and 2 touchdowns.

Staubach was hailed by Navy coach Wayne Hardin as "the greatest quarterback Navy ever had."

Once he hit the pro ranks, Staubach sustained the level of excellence he forged at the Academy. His tenure at the helm of the Dallas offense established him as one of the sport's greatest leaders ever, as he was equally revered for his performance and his leadership skills.

Staubach was voted Most Valuable Player of Super Bowl VI, the franchise's first championship. He completed 12 of 19 passes for 119 yards and 2 touchdowns over the course of the victory.

Staubach was voted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 1985, the first year he became eligible for this honor. He had been elected to the College Hall of Fame four years earlier.

But what does any of this have to do with holding a high-level position in the pentagon?

It is a proven fact that the same ideals instilled in military leadership training are critical to motivation and excellence as a leader in sports. Subsequently, those ideals are invaluable when it comes to leadership in any corporate organization. The Navy is no different.

Military training preaches diligence, discipline and dedication. Athletes must possess those same three traits in order to achieve excellence on the field of play. And by applying those same qualities to the Navy position, Staubach will undoubtedly fuel confidence and commitment in and from those beneath him.

Practically all of America's great leaders in the modern era have a background in both sports and the military. John F. Kennedy played football, swam and sailed competitively at Harvard, then became a war hero with the Navy. George Bush played several sports at Yale and went on to fly a number of missions for the Air Force.

Besides, Staubach has already proven that his acquired skills can be applied to an administrative setting. He is currently running a Dallas real estate firm that bears his name, a business that is both lucrative and expanding.

So while a Cowboy running the Navy may seem like an extremely odd proposition, Roger Staubach is probably the ideal man for the job. Whether piloting a no-huddle offense or handling a powerful fighting force, he is still truly at home at the helm of America's team.

And now what we're for

CHRIS MASTERJOHN

"We want cooperation because competition erodes solidarity and reduces our humanity. What does it say about us if we can't live productive lives without always trying to put ourselves first at the expense of others?"

In my last two columns, I outlined the main reasons for which I believe we should oppose capitalism, and presented a perspective that finds private property an excess of authority rather than a natural right that must be protected, and offered a solution to reconcile the need for privacy and ability to use resources for personal uses with the need to curb the excessive authority of private property and injustices that come with it.

So now our task is to offer an alternative to capitalism. It isn't enough to simply be opposed to something. If we can't come up with something better, then no matter how many flaws in something we point out, our opposition to it is worthless.

Before coming up with a model though, we should come up with some values we want it to embody. I propose the following values: participatory democracy, freedom, non-hierarchical structure, equitable distribution of wealth, equitable division of labor, and cooperation.

Participatory democracy, freedom, and a non-hierarchical structure kind of fit together. If we really value democracy, that means we value people having direct say over the decisions that impact their lives. A system is democratic to the extent that people's impact over decisions is proportionate to the impact of the decision upon them. The closer we get to fulfilling the maxim, the more a system is based on direct democracy, and the less hierarchical it becomes.

Likewise, if we value freedom, we want, to the extent possible, people to be free of coercion and free of others making decisions for them. There are two ways to achieve this: the first is to have no interaction with other people at all, and the second is to make decisions through participatory democracy. The first may be appropriate in some situations, but it is impossible to model an economy on. Since decisions can only be made unilaterally or democratically, we can only fulfill our values of freedom by fulfilling our values of democracy, which both translate into a non-hierarchical participatory democratic structure.

In promoting the idea of democracy tequality in decision-making power) and non-hierarchical structures (equality in the enjoyment of freedom) the logical extension is to promote equality in wealth distribution and division of labor. People's share of the pie should be based on the effort they expend, not the power they accrue, and if there is onerous work that must be done, everyone should either take equal part in it so that no one is doomed to a life of only onerous work, or should learn to live without the products of onerous work.

We want cooperation because competition erodes solidarity and reduces our humanity. What does it say about us if we can't live productive lives without always trying to put ourselves first at the expense of others?

Socialism—and perhaps we should just trash the word, given its damnation to synonymy with central planning—has long had a libertarian wing, often falling under the titles "anarchism," "anarcho-communism," "anarcho-syndicalism," or "libertarian socialism."

Whatever you want to call it, I would suggest that anyone interested in libertarian alternatives to capitalism and markets check out the website www.parecon.org as a starting point. "ParEcon" is short for "Participatory Economics," a model that economists Michael Albert and Robin Hahnel have developed as a detailed economic vision to show just how such an economy could function in an efficient and productive manner. Of course, most of the concepts and values of ParEcon are part of the long libertarian socialist tradition, but Albert and Hahnel's contributions are unique in that they move beyond vague generalities and lay out a detailed vision that is convincing and can stand up to analysis.

There are basically two main categories of economic decisions that must be made: in one category, there are the macro-economic questions of what will be produced, how much, and how to distribute it; and in the other, how they will be produced (for example, the decisions pertaining to the inner workings of the workplaces that produce/provide the goods and services). For these categories we can have two forms of decision-making bodies: consumers' councils and workers' councils.

Workers' councils would consist of everyone in a given workplace that democratically make the decisions that affect that workplace. They could, of course, also consist of sub-divisions to make decisions that only affect part of the workplace. We should take note here that while this does involve people in increased amounts of time making decisions, it also eliminates the need for professional decision-makers who spend just as much time. The difference is not in how much time is spent making decisions, but rather whether the decisions are made democratically or unilaterally.

Consumers' councils would be councils at a community level where individuals and families would submit consumption requests, and those requests would be hashed out to be modified to ensure equitable and realistic distributions. Consumers' councils would round up collections of individual consumption requests for that community and the consumption requests of that community itself (for resources to maintain public parks, for example), and communication would take place between the aggregate consumers' councils and workers' councils to compare the consumption requests with the economic possibilities. If resources must be reallocated to different workplaces to meet the consumption requests, plans would be drawn up, or if it were simply impossible to satisfy the consumption requests, the information would be relayed back to individual councils to negotiate modifications of requests. I think in a transition period this would be rocky and take quite a while to settle into, but as with any transition, things would smooth out over time.

In order to determine how to distribute the wealth, some sort of prices should be set. The prices should be objective calculations that reflect the effort that went into the product, measured by aggregate hours of work, the natural resources used, and the social costs, such as environmental damage. This would be hard to accomplish through direct democracy, so it is important that any indirect democracy and delegation involved be kept in strong democratic check through easy instant recall mechanisms, thorough transparency, and final sovereignty to accept or reject decisions by the people through direct democracy.

This is a vision of a future that is recognizable. The extent to which it is possible is the extent to which we work for it. Over time, through trial and error, our visions can be refined. But it is clear that there are better alternatives to what we have now. Ultimately, all that can stand in our way is our own inaction.

PAUL RAFELSON

Are you bored? Tired of what life currently has to offer? Have you thought about taking up a hobby, but none of them sound interesting? Are the sports too competitive for you to want to start now? Is life getting too tough and you feel that the walls are closing in on you, and that you are trapped and there is no escape? If you answered yes to all these questions then your days of being down are over. With the invention of a new game, life will become fun and fresh once again.

The new game I am talking about dates back from the olden days where stalking a stranger was fun and enjoyable for both parties. Stalking dates back to the Aborigines in the early 14th century. The Aborigines enjoyed the fun and excitement of being and actively talking themselves. That is why I have decided to bring that joy of non-violent stalking fun to you and your family for generations to come.

The name of the game is Supermarket Stalker (Hypermarket Stalker for you Europeans). It is a new game I have personally adapted from the Aborigines and converted it into a fun, exciting game of skill and speed. The rules are simple. As many people as you like can play at once, but too many people may increase the difficulty of a perfect stalk. All stalking begins and ENDS at the grocery store. As you enter the grocery store, all players must choose a victim. They must then follow the victim around the store, and be at no times less than 12 feet away from the victim. As a stalker, you are required to possess the same shopping container that your victim chooses, either basket or shopping cart. If the victim has an infant and has to use a shopping cart with an infant holder, so must the player. Your goal is to fill your shopping cart with the exact same items as your victim by following them around the store and placing the item within eight seconds after the victim chooses it. Every item you pick is worth one point. If you and your partner have a successful talk and you have more than your partner, you win.

Getting points in this game is not the hard part. It is keeping them. If your victim glances back at you, two points are lost each sighting. If the victim makes direct reciprocating eye contact with you, that is a loss of 10 points. If you fail to pick up an item in time, lose two points per item. If you are not within 12 feet of the victim, lose five points. If the victim notices you are following them you automatically are out of the round with your current score. However, the opponent player may continue scoring. If the victim decides not to contact you, but a store employee, you have a chance to win the game here.

When a victim contacts a store employee, and it's believed to be about their suspicion of you, you must find another employee and make a similar complaint about the victim. If the store employee finds the victim to be correct, you are allowed only to keep your current score at the time, while your opponent may continue scoring. However, if you manage somehow to get the employee to side with you against the victim, then you must forfeit playing for this round, but due to excellent persuasive skills, you will be awarded 50 additional points. So, if your opponent was up by ten points before, and completes the game with only 20 more points, you still win.

By request of the National Supermarket Stalker Association (N.S.S.A.), I have published the following list of additional rules and fouls for official matches.

1. Leaving the supermarket is an offside and results in forfeiture and a score of zero.

2. Dropping hints such as putting a note on your opponents' victims in an attempt of notification is also a foul resulting in forfeiture of the round and possibly league expulsion.

3. The victim must be a certifiable stranger. Planting victims will be punished by forfeiture and possible league expulsion.

4. Stalkers are responsible for their own score, similar a method used in gold. They must write down all of the products in their carts as they are placing them. Any items not in the cart, or not on the scorecard will not be allowed for scoring. Referees will be watching through surveillance camera to make sure no score manipulation will take place. Also, undercover consumer/referees will also be monitoring all league events.

In the event of a tie in a non-playoff situation, the tie will be recorded and one point designated to each team. In a playoff situation, the players who are tied will be required to perform one following step. Upon completion of the victims' shopping as they approach the checkout aisle, the stalkers will approach the victims causally and ask them to recall the prices of items that are in their carts. (e.g. "Excuse me, I couldn't help but notice you purchased the Bic Leg Shavers. I don't suppose you know how much they were?") The stalkers will continue to ask these questions until it becomes evident to the victim that they are being stalked. Each time the victim goes through the product recognition process with the player, that player will receive one point per item. However, if they manage to find out the price from the victim, they will get an additional half-point. At the end of this tie-breaker round, a winner will be declared. If the result continues to be a tie, a French-bread light-saber duel will commence. A double-sided French bread will not be allowed at any time unless it is on sale for the price of the single size. The contestant still standing will be declared the winner.

Now that I have explained the rules of this new game that is sweeping the nation, go have fun everybody. I hope you all enjoy the countless hours of fun Supermarket stalker will bring to your life. It's a game with something for everybody. And now that the holidays are beginning to take shape, shopping trips to the local market with significant other, mother, or father will no longer have to be boring or dull. That's why the Aborigines have been playing it since the 14th century: the English are just catching on now, and it's time for American to become the dominant country in a new athletic event. So go out there, stalk those crowds of commerce, those crazy cats of commercialism, and always remember its not stalking unless it's Supermarket Stalking.

Oh, and remember just in case somebody takes this too seriously, the game begins and ends in the supermarket. If you can't deal with that, then you deserve to be locked up. Thank you, and Happy Holidays!

EMILY VACANTI

As my last column for the semester, I am going to let the UMass students in on a secret that you all should already know, but that is being covered up by the students from the other four colleges in the area: UMass is better than average. Now I know what most of you may be thinking: "UMass is not better than average. It's either average or worse than average." But I am being honest by saying that we are better than average. There are many reasons that I think this, and the biggest is because of something that recently happened to me.

I decided that for next semester instead of taking my typical four classes with a gym class or a dance class, that I would do something more interesting and fun that might help prepare me for the real world in nine months. So I chose to apply for a variety of internships. Looking through the list of internships almost made me dizzy, but I did notice one clear parallel between most of them. They were all for cities nowhere near Amherst. Most of the ones that I saw were for Washington D.C., New York, or Boston. Now the main problem with any of these is that I have an apartment with a lease. I cannot just get up and leave my apartment. I would have to find someone to sublet, pay a subletting fee, and then hope that I can take my last two Sociology requirements. So I realized that I just could not do that.

So I applied for a couple of internships around this area (Northampton, Amherst, Springfield). As I called to find out about these internships, I learned that they were very competitive. The coordinator of the internship that I applied for in Amherst had been receiving applications regularly, and told me that they would pick up the pace within the week. The coordinator of the Northampton internship said that they also get a steady stream of applicants and that that would be a solid competition also. Next I called about the internship in Springfield. They told me that it was not very well known at UMass, and so I was one of two UMass applicants. But they also said that there were other applicants from the five-college area (Amherst, Hampshire, Smith, Mount Holyoke). In light of all of this, I got an interview for one of the above-mentioned internships. Now I will not tell you what was said during any of the interviews, mainly because I was asked to keep everything confidential, but I will tell you that what I was told explains why UMass is better than average.

The unifying theme is that if you are a UMass student, realize that there is good competition for internships. The basics are that you have to speak clearly, write well, dress professionally, and act in a mature, professional manner at all times, regardless of the situation.

My impression, from many different people and groups away from this school, is that UMass does not have the reputation of teaching students that act in this way. I have spoken to people that honestly believe that we are all horny party animals that participate in drunken orgies all weekend long, and then give school-work a pathetic attempt during the week. Most people do not acknowledge the students at this school that work hard to get and keep their grades up, as well as those of us who work hard at extracurricular activities. Some of us drink and party, some of us do not. Every UMass student should not be seen as drunk and horny because some of them are, and yet it seems as though the majority of us are seen that way.

So we have less chance at opportunities that we could really benefit from In the long run, because of how UMass is seen as a whole. If we are seen as individuals, then something amazing happens: you can clearly see that UMass is actually better than average.

You probably figured out my next statement. I got one of the internships. I got the internship in Springfield. True. I was one of two UMass students applying for this internship, but remember that there were students from the whole five-college area that applied. I competed with them for one of two internship openings, and I got one of them. So, from now on, no matter what anyone says, I am always going to believe that UMass is better than average.

To drive my point home, just to let students know that I am not the only one, many of my friends have also applied for internships that seem to be out of reach. They have also been very successful. It is not necessarily where you go to school or your upbringing that matters, though in some cases I will admit that the judges are completely biased to a certain education and background, but more so your experience, possibly your grades, how you present yourself, and your plan for the future. If you present yourself in a manner that shows that you are average, or in worse cases below average, then that is how you will be perceived. But if you are proud of yourself and present yourself as being better than average, then you will be amazed at the results. So do not let anyone fool you. Just because you are at UMass, that does not mean that you are below average. It actually means that you are better than average. Now that I proved it — all that you have to do is believe it.

Noise Conspiracy knows the beat

REFUSED

Burning Heart/Epitaph

THE (INTERNATIONAL) NOISE CONSPIRACY
Survival Sickness
Burning Heart/Epitaph

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Swedish punk pioneers Refused released arguably the definitive late 90s punk album with the mind-blowing The Shape of Punk To Come. "How can we expect anyone to listen if we are using the same old voice?" they asked, and proceeded to answer their own question by taking the rigid rules of punk purists and burning them alive. From the ashes came an invigorating mix of techno, hardcore, and a classic anti-authority stance (this time x10) against capitalism and complacency. The album remains an all-time classic, inspiring countless new bands and blowing wide open the boundaries of what punk can be.

COURTESY ELYN BERE

The (International) Noise Conspiracy certainly doesn't lack the motion to move to the new beat.

"How many people went to the Anarchists Book Fair today?" inquired Dennis Lyxzen, former vocalist of the defunct Refused, current vocalist of The (International) Noise Conspiracy, during a show at the Axis in Boston with At The Drive-In and Murder City Devils. After peering into a crowd of two raised hands and a lot of confused faces he remarked, "Ha, and they say we preach to the converted!" before blasting into a song from their debut album Survival Sickness. The spirit of Refused lives on in TNC, and Epitaph has tried to tie up the loose ends of the former band with the posthumous The New Noise Theology E.P. The questions are inevitable. Is TNC as good as Refused, and is the EP just a blatant cash run?

If the intensity of Refused didn't lead one to believe that they would eventually explode and break up, as they did, then the song on Shape titled "Refused Are Fucking Dead" might have been a more forceful hint. It's here on the EP in (sub) remixed form, making the original song just as dead as Refused. Unlike so many punk bands, Refused focused on their music as much as their lyrics, and much of the same, the sounds are different. A mix of classic sounding British rock with a 60s mod feel, Survival Sickness is a big middle finger to anyone who claims punk is dead or the spirit of revolt has dissolved. Lyxzen's screaming has been replaced with his curt singing voice, which is fine, although exploring his vocal talents more could be a real plus for the band. The music is solid throughout, boasting lull, busy arrangements thanks to a large cast, and they are never averse to experimenting, as evidenced in slower paced songs and an instrumental.

Just as impressive as the music, however, are the lyrics and the ideas behind them, detailed in essays inside the booklet. In addition to fleshed out concepts, the songs even have explanatory titles: "Smash It Up" is "the creative urge to destroy bourgeois culture" and "Ready Steady Go!" is "the celebration of passion and resistence." The essays about creativity and time, as well as the questionnaire and suggested list of things to do ("spend more time naked") are amazing and should be taught in any sociology class. It's rare to see a collection of people with an agenda this focused and progressive, and when the sounds of their ideas are this good, it's something to hold on to. Tightly.

Toasters and Pilfers play Providence

THE TOASTERS/THE PILFERS
Lupo's Heartbreak Hotel
Dec. 2

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

Last Saturday night the bitter cold Rhode Island air froze more than a few fingers and ears. Inside Lupo's, however, the atmosphere was hot and animated courtesy of two great live acts.

The Toasters and the Pilfers each played a lively set in front of a small but energetic crowd of about 300, mostly comprised of high school-aged kids dressed in everything from top hats and suits to leather jackets and jewelry. The Toasters cruised through a slick set that lasted just more than an hour, playing a mixture of both old and new favorites for their legion of fans.

The band has been going strong for nearly 20 years since coming over from London and has gone through several lineup shifts, and still has managed to produce tons of releases and countless tours with their genre-crossing ska. Fronted by lead singer Rob "Bucket" Hingley and trumpeter "The Sledge," the Toasters played many familiar hits for the crowd, such as "Underground Town," "Two-Tone Army," and "Ploughshares and Guns." The group was joined onstage by ska legend and trombonist Buford O'Sullivan, who frequently makes guest appearances with the band.

Hingley also took the time to chat with his fans and sell the merchandise of his band and his own record label (Moon Ska) prior to the show. Hingley's leadership and presence in the band for almost two decades has been the reason for the success of the Toasters.

During the course of the show the crowd was treated to a surprise when the band was joined onstage by Pilfers lead singer and former Toasters member Goobe Raby. Later on in the set, the sextet played crowd favorites like "Decision at Midnight" and "Weekend in L.A." and closed out their set with the title track from their most recent studio release Don't Let the Bastards Grind You Down.

However, the band returned after a long chant of "one more song" to play "I Wasn't Gonna Call You Anyway" and "Matt Davis Special Agent" to send the fired-up audience back home into the freezing streets of Providence.

The Pilfers, one of the best live acts in New England over the last couple years, played a sharp but too short opening set to start off the night. The five-piece group out of New York City concentrated more on their new material and tracks off their most recent album, but still managed to throw in "Yakuza" and "Hypnotized" to delight their old school fans. Unfortunately for both bands, it appeared that the sets were cut short due to the 10 p.m. curfew set by the club because of WBRU club night. Still, both groups gave their fans what they came for and did not fail to disappoint.

Demerath in Pub and beyond

BEN DEMERATH
Club Passim
Nov. 16

By Taryn Scott
Collegian Correspondent

CAMBRIDGE, MA – Harvard Square begins to bustle around 8 p.m. on Thursday nights. It becomes difficult to find a parking space on Palmer Street, lined with assorted cafes, bookstores and bars. Couples and small groups seek refuge from the crisp fall air.

The basement-level Club Passim is filled almost to capacity with bluegrass music fans dining on Middle Eastern cuisine. There is a low murmur of voices in the dim room as the guests await that night's opening act, Ben Demerath.

Wearing casual dress-colored pants and a black T-shirt, Demerath appears at the front of the room with guest bass player David Chalfant of the Sickles. The audience falls silent and the stage becomes the only source of light. Moments later, the room welcomes the sounds of Demerath's positive title track, "Jack of Lode."

Waging his audience to gain appreciation for the art of bluegrass music, Demerath prefers this type of "listening room" to the loud music bars where he feels his performance is relegated to be some background music. "Bluegrass music doesn't get half the respect it deserves," explained Demerath as he noted that listeners are reluctant to compare the work of bluegrass musicians to other genres, even though each requires the same amount of effort and practice time.

Demerath began his journey to bluegrass music when he switched his major from the classical Oboe to Ethnomusicology at Northwestern University in Chicago. It was at this time that he picked up a guitar and became involved in a Folk/Rock group that played local bars and campus parties. Demerath's heart never again returned to classical music.

Staring ahead at the concrete walls of Club Passim, guitar in hand, Demerath tries to become the character he has created in his song. He focuses on singing well, hoping to draw attention to the overall effect of his music rather than to his lyrics, which he feels are overemphasized in music right now. Demerath points out that he is a "singer, not a songwriter," even though he has written a majority of the songs he performs.

Between songs, Demerath interacts with the audience, telling stories, and giving some insight into his writing. He appears to value the response he gets from his listeners and feels lucky to be where he is right now in the music business. He is looking to broaden his fan base gradually, but "certainly [isn't] looking for fame and fortune."

Demerath feels that he has received tremendous support from his record label, Compass Records, which allows him to make records on his own while he continues his roles as father, husband, and teacher. With their help, Demerath has been able to maintain his job teaching music at Bement School in Deerfield and play his music on weekends. He sees this as an ideal schedule, one that allows him to keep making music.

"I've got to get home early tonight," said Demerath before beginning his last song. "My wife's probably already sleeping, and I have to be at school early in the morning to set up my third grade recorders." Demerath said, demonstrating the lifestyle he regularly juggles.

Being on stage, in the spotlight, is a natural high for Demerath. He likens the experience to "the thrill you might get playing in a soccer game," and doesn't plan on giving it up anytime soon. Demerath currently has a deal with Compass for a second album, which he expects to begin next year.

Amfibian jams at Pearl Street

Amfibian jammed for hours on end at Pearl Street last week.

AMFIBIAN
Pearl Street Night Club
Pearl Street

By Caroline Fullmer
Collegian Staff

Amfibian played last Friday night at the Pearl Street nightclub. With a packed house, a solid groove and a seven-member band, what else could one want?

On Dec. 1 a little known band called Amfibian strolled into Northampton to perform before a sold-out crowd at the Pearl Street Night Club. Amfibian, a seven-member band from Princeton, New Jersey, rocked for nearly two hours. Coming on stage after Addison Groove Project, Amfibian quickly noted how excited and friendly the crowd was. Loosened up by Addison's funky sounds, the crowd quickly picked up the beat of Amfibian's opener "Hate," a fun, groovy song. The stage presence of this seven-member band was rather roomy. Four guitars, one keyboardist, two drum sets, yet no instrument dominated another.

Amfibian is truly best known for their lead man Tom Marshall, the writer of many Phish songs, and good friend of guitar virtuoso Trey Anastasio. Amfibian is not a tribute band to Phish, clearly performing their own personal songs with grace. Songs like "Appreciate" and "Oblivious" proved that the new band, whose members all have day jobs, truly know how to play and are tightly knit. With guitar solos, drum solos, and excellent lyrics, Amfibian left the stage for intermission leaving the crowd yearning for more.

The second set opened with "Mesapotomia" and then went straight into an older song called "The Wedge." Not necessarily a Phish cover, because it is a Tom Marshall original, many fans sang along to the slow yet hard song, and shortly thereafter Amfibian brought out a guest musician from the local area to perform the sweet song "Brian and Robert." The guest musician Brain Mulkekhey added much to Amphibian's sound with his unique playing on the harmonica. Bringing a faster pace and louder tone, Amfibian quickly changed mood into the more lively fast paced jams like "The Way I Feel" and "If I Can't Turn to You."

"The Way I Feel," quite possibly the best song of the night, had lyrics that brought nostalgia and was undoubtedly the most energetic of the many songs that night. Ending the second set with "If I Can't Turn To You," Amfibian had proven their talent over and above what anyone in the crowd could have expected. For a band that has been playing together for merely seven years, Amfibian proved that it is truly the talent of each member that makes conjoined music sound so good.

Coming back on stage for an encore of "Drunk" and "Face" the crowd was given one last chance to get down and to cheer the band. After the music the band members stayed after to shake hands and thank the crowd. They answered questions and gave more insight about their tour plans. For now Amfibian is only touring around the Northeast and has no plans to perform for New Years Eve. However, they do plan to continue to play into the new year and will definitely be coming back to visit Northampton again.

Amfibian performed a night of fun, excellent music, pleasing the sold-out crowd, themselves, and even the bartender. They're a great band with excellent songs and fantastic lyrics. Amfibian is a band not to be missed or ignored. More information can be found about Amfibian and Tom Marshall on the official Phish webpage, www.phish.com.

Arty Alternatives Synaesthesia return to Valley with old and new

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Arty rockers Synaesthesia mark their return to the Valley area tonight with a performance at the Iron Horse in Northampton. The show is a homecoming of sorts for the band, whose members previously attended UMass and earned a sizable audience and critical acclaim for their energetic live shows, including the 1994 Spring Concert.

Upon compiling four years of live shows to their credit and the release of a self-titled record in 1996, the band chose to take some time apart and explore other paths in life. During the off time the band's older material has been reworked and polished, and will be supplemented with new songs penned and composed during the break.

"We never stop playing," noted drummer Jason McIssac in a phone interview Wednesday, who wields the sticks during the live show but juggles his diverse musical talents in the studio. He's not concerned about Synaesthesia being rusty after the hiatus, noting the varied influences that are now brought to the table.

"Our guitarist has developed a kind of Pixies sound, and also was into electronic music, while I have gotten into heavy stuff like Rage Against the Machine and electronic stuff as well," McIssac said, adding that other band members have examined jazz elements.

Synaesthesia had a chance to get back into the groove recently, McIssac explained, during a recent show at the Middle East in Boston to a packed and dancing house. The band has enjoyed touring with a host of local, national, and internationally known talents such as 311, Buffalo Tom, and Government Mule. PJ Harvey, Radiohead, and The Verve are on McIssac's short list of bands it would be cool to play with, none of which should be out of reach after their new CD (still shopping for a label) is released and spreads the word.

"Between rocking and arty, with breakbeats and house music" is how McIstac describes the Synaesthesia sound for newcomers tonight. A fresh, talented band with a passion for playing in the region should make for a memorable performance at Iron Horse.

5. If space is not available in your assigned lot, go to either Lot 25 or yellow lot (back west of Physical Plant)
6. During snow conditions, it is not possible to guarantee normal lot capacity will be available
7. If you receive a parking citation and believe it was inappropriately issued, you may appeal it at Parking Services within 21 days from the date issued. Appeals can be submitted in writing, appealed in person to the Hearing Clerk, or emailed (hearing@admin.umass.edu)

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS - FALL 2000

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m. each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. In addition, the academic calendar includes Saturday, December 23, as an official snow day in the event that the University is closed December 22. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day "hot line" is 545-3630. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

If the University is closed until 10:30 a.m.

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am	held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm	held as originally scheduled
4:00 pm	held as originally scheduled
except
8:00 am Dec. 22	rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec 22

If the University is closed all day but open in the evening:

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am	rescheduled to 8:45 pm same day
1:30 pm	rescheduled to 6:30 pm exam day
4:00 pm	rescheduled to 8:45 pm exam day
1:30 pm Dec. 16	rescheduled to 6:30 pm Dec 16
4:00 pm Dec. 16	rescheduled to 8:45 pm Dec 16

If the University is closed all afternoon and all evening:

8:00 am	held as originally scheduled
10:30 am	held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm	rescheduled to 6:30 pm exam day
4:00 pm	rescheduled to 8:45 pm exam day

Well here I am, I haven't written anything for sports in about a year, but I think that I'm well qualified to write the Trash Talk this week for one simple reason: I don't know anything about football, and obviously, none of these other freaks do either.

First of all, I do have to say, that anyone who picked against Minnesota should be run over by a truck. Minnesota has the best record in their conference, not to mention the entire NFL. The Vikings should win the Super Bowl. Period.

If I had a dollar for every time Sam picked a losing team, I'd go out and buy myself a McLahrin I-1. They're imported and can only seat one person. They can go like 250 miles per hour. The luxury tax on one of these things coming into the US is like $100,000. That's how much I distrust Sam's football picks. For all the yelling and boasting and hot air that he is constantly blowing out his fat head, Sam doesn't say much. I think he hides his insecurity about his football knowledge by arguing with Smitty. Did you really think that Indianapolis would beat the Jets? Guess what, you can talk and talk and talk Sam, but you're not saying anything, and you're definitely sucking at football. P.S. stop hitting on my roommate.

As for Smitty, quit your whining. Seriously. If I had a dollar for every time you whined I'd buy two McLahrin I-1's. I know you want what's best for the paper, but don't you think that someone who is in charge of the sport's page should have some semblance of an idea about the sports they're covering? Why did you pick Cleveland? They've been outscored by over 100 points over the last three weeks! What are you still doing here? Weren't you supposed to have graduated like a year and a half ago? Maybe if you actually went to class and passed, you'd be able to get out of UMass, get a job, and get some real knowledge about who's going to beat the spread. P.S. stop hitting on me. You're friends with my boyfriend, for Christ's sake!

Adam Martignetti, you sad, sad man. What do you think you're doing? You belong at the News Desk, not the Sports Department! Who do you think you're kidding? Maybe you can cover the SGA, but you can't cover the spread. Dallas? Hello? Tampa Bay actually has some players; Dallas has...nothing. Maybe if you actually left the Campus Center basement you'd have a life. Get someone else to do layout one night and go out into the real world, where there are live trees, live animals, and live women (as opposed to the fake one's you're looking at on the internet). How about you stop worrying about who's covering the presidential election and start concerning yourself with the real story: your lame-ass attempt to pick teams. By the way, Katie Holmes is ugly and she can't act her way out of a wet paper bag.

Adam White: up by eight games in week five. And now sitting dead last. Kudos for picking Minnesota, but that can't save you from the fire. You're burning bridges, buddy. You promised to buy me dinner like three months ago. I offered to drive you to New York City to pick up your bike. I picked up Eric and Matt at the last minute from Hartford as a favor to you. And what favors have you done for me lately? None. Thanks. You're football picks are a cry for help and evidence of a greater evil: your negligence as a friend. Ouh, it hurts, doesn't it; personal attacks in what is supposed to be a light-hearted competition. Well maybe now you'll stop trying to move your tack (you're not in the game, man) and start doing your job. And please, try and make the picks by yourself. No offense Melissa, but you know just as little about football as I do.

And now for David Rose: the only boy to continually bring me cookies at work. You're sweet. You're the only one to pick the Jets, good show. But you also picked Arizona. Aren't you supposed to be the one man down here that knows the most about football? Maybe they're slipping drugs into your pop over there at WMUA and that's why you're acting like you SMOKE CRACK. Why did you shave your goatee? Now you look like one of the visiting middle schoolers that is wandering around campus with some field trip. I know you try to hide it, by befriending both sides, but you're just a media whore. One minute you're laughing with the Sports crew, the next you're livin' it up on the radio. Just like a seventh-grader you're trying to be minter popularity. Newsflash, Willis: you're not God's gift to Collegian football columns. You're a fraud. Now go back to the master control room and leave the print to the real writers, like me.

Thank you Eric, for actually running this. And thank your girlfriend for me too. Thank you, and goodnight.

– Catherine "C.S." Turner

Jumping Rope (a.k.a. Jump Roping)

It's a sad day in College Station, Texas, for the Jump Rope Team has graduated. No more does the rhythmic slap of a rope echo through the first floor southeast corner of the Student Recreation Center at Texas A&M.

The first college jump-rope or skipping-team is no more. The motley group of Mark Holmes, Chris Holmes (no relation), Amber Thomas and Corey Farley (cousins) will no longer bring glory to Texas.

"As far as we know we were the first college jumping team," said Chris Holmes. "Nobody is jumping now."

Chris has been jumping up and down for a long time.

"I started in third grade with my Physical Education. He was trying to start a team."

In 1998 Chris' freestyle routine captured silver in the 1999 National Championships.

"To be honest with you, I don't remember. I've been to so many of those things. Its not about the medals, it's fun," said Chris.

Whether he remembers it or not, Chris won the gold medal in both the freestyle and the speed competitions at the 2000 National Championships. Chris credits his victory to the organization of his choreography.

"You have to be able do tricks on both sides," Chris said on the scoring of matches. "Difficulty of tricks, symmetry, use of floor space, multiple under tricks, crossing tricks."

Chris still tries to keep in touch with his old teammates.

"One of them is my old room mate, and another in Arkansas. He works for WalMart. Corey is in graduate school."

The writers of "Third and 48" thought to contact Chris' old roommate, but we remember the last traumatizing time we attempted to call Walmart. Only our most loyal readers and dedicated fans will recall that Walmart will only allow us to speak to their "Public Relations Person." Damn.

Eric Soderstrom and Ryan Benharris are the co-editors of "Third and 48" and today we let Collegian Jumping Rope expert Ken Campbell contribute to this article. Thanks, yo. Also, if you read the column yesterday, Wife Carrying is real.

Karim Shabazz (7-foot-2) and Marcus Douthit (6-foot-10) came up with a pair of big blocks in the game's opening minutes, but Rhymer stormed back with a swat of his own and a smooth baby hook to pace the home team to an early 15-9 edge.

Providence kept it close behind the picture-perfect shooting of pointman John Linehan. The junior shot didn't miss a shot over the entire contest, going 4-for-4 from the field (3-for-3 from three point range) and canning all six of his free throw attempts to finish with 17 points. He also racked up a game-high six steals, all in the first half.

But unusual composure by UMass on ends of the floor kept the home team out in front over the final 12:40 of the first half. Senior tri-captain Winston Smith came up with a huge play with 2:13 to go in the half by soaring through traffic for a one-handed put-back off a miss by teammate Micah Brand to put the Maroon and White up 30-25.

On the ensuing Friar possession, Linehan tried vainly to find an open teammate in UMass' tenacious defensive web, until Minuteman Shannon Crooks picked his pocket and keyed a break the other way.

"We almost looked like a zone offense against their man-to-man defense," said Providence coach Tim Welsh. "We had one guy handling the ball and four guys standing around."

The Maroon and White's second-half woes started after Douhit lowered his shoulder and powered through Rhymer for two to trim the UMass lead to four, 50-46. The Minutemen shot blanks on their next possession but quickly got the ball back via a Smith swipe, and appeared poised for another deuce after setting up forward Eric Williams deep in the Friar paint.

But PC's Chris Rogers came out of nowhere to strip the ball from a leaping Williams, keying a transition the other way that ended in a Rogers three-ball from the left elbow. "We had four or five times where we drove right up to the basket and had the ball snatched out of our hands," said Flint. "That was one of the biggest parts of the game."

Providence climbed back on top at the 10:19 mark, when freshman forward Maris Laksa connected on a three-point bomb from the left corner to hand the Friars back the lead, 57-54.

On the ensuing Friar possession, Linehan tried vainly to find an open teammate in UMass' tenacious defensive web, until Minuteman Shannon Crooks picked his pocket and keyed a break the other way.

"We almost looked like a zone offense against their man-to-man defense," said Providence coach Tim Welsh. "We had one guy handling the ball and four guys standing around."

one has shouldered the burden.

Senior point guard Kathy Coyner has been solid, and without her, this team would be lost. Jen Butler has been reliable in the post, but she can't handle all the frontcourt responsibilities herself.

In order for the Minutewomen to win, they must execute the basics. The traditionally tough O'Brien defense must be on par and the team is going to have to win the rebound battle. Also, the shooting problem will have to be resolved. If the Minutewomen can hit shots, play defense, and rebound the ball, they'll be fine. But that's easier said than done.

"They've got to fight," O'Brien said. "Composure is the biggest thing we're looking for. I've pushed them hard the past two days. Part of it comes down to them – they've got to be willing to fight and compete. If it were easy to win, everybody would do it. It's not easy to win. If you want to win, you have to fight to win."

The Minutemen would look the game at 63-all off two Mack foul shots less than four minutes later, but by the time the tri-captain snapped out of his field goal funk, the team was mired in a double-digit deficit at 75-66.

"A game like this, I don't think you can put it behind you," Rhymer said. "You've just got to learn from it, learn from your mistakes. We aren't ever going to give up on each other, that's definite."

and topped it all off by sticking a pull-up jumper from just inside the foul line with 1:12 remaining to extend his team's lead to seven.

However, these were not even his best plays of the game. With 17:09 left in the second frame, Mack took an inbounds pass and missed a long two from the corner. It looked like the Friars would easily haul down the board, but somehow, in serious traffic, Smith was able to out jump the Providence frontcourt and tip the ball across the lane to Brand, who dunked it home with authority and picked up the foul.

This culminated a great two-thirds of a game for Smith, but like the rest of his team, went cold down the stretch, and failed to score a point in the second half.

"To our kid's credit, he got nothing in the second half," Welsh said.

Smith was not the only one playing surprisingly well, however. UMass seemed intent on getting the ball inside and challenging 7'2" Friar center Karim Shabazz, and Rhymer and Brand seemed happy to do just that, scoring 16 and 12 points in the contest, respectively. In addition, the two players complimented each other well on the low blocks, clearing up each other's misses on the offensive glass.

Probably the best thing the two did all night, though, was stay out of foul trouble, as that has been a serious problem for the Maroon and White all year. Rhymer did not have to go to the bench once after picking up a foul, and consequently played a season-high 30 minutes. Brand also was able to stay out of foul trouble, totaling only a single personal in his 25 minutes of action.

In contrast, Shabazz continually had to head to the bench in the first half, due to foul trouble, despite the fact that the Friars only had six team fouls in the entire half.

"We wanted to do what other teams had been doing to us and get their big guys in foul trouble," Mack said. "In the first half we did that."

Unfortunately, the good play of Smith, Rhymer and Brand was not enough to give their team the win, but if the game is a sign of anything to come, it will be that teams can no longer key completely on Crooks and Mack, for fear of being burned elsewhere.

10 others. Last season UMass limited the Parkside, Saskatchewan native to a single assist in the three contests.

Providence also has another threat in the offensive zone in Jon DiSalvatore and Matt Libby. Both have totaled five goals and added 11 helpers on the campaign. The San Jose Sharks drafted DiSalvatore in the fourth round of the 2000 NHL Entry Draft.

But it has not been the offense that has allowed the Friars to get off to such a hot start. The strength has been between the pipes with the goaltending tandem of Nolan Schaefer and Boyd Ballard.

Schaefer has posted five wins on the season and has only allowed 15 goals in his eight games played. More impressive than the 15 goals allowed is his save percentage. The sophomore has 250 shots and enters the game with a .943 save percentage and a 1.86 goals against average. The Yellow Grass, Saskatchewan native was also drafted in the 2000 NHL Draft by the San Jose Sharks.

A MONSTER OF A LOSS

Jekyll and Hyde ends in an ugly 85-70 defeat

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Both the players and the coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team admitted that they needed a win last night when they hosted Providence at the William D. Mullins Center. They needed to build some confidence, see some positive results and pick up some momentum before hitting the road for a crucial three-game stretch.

Let's hope they can get by without it.

Providence used a 22-10 run over a seven-minute stretch of the second half to power past Massachusetts by a final score of 85-70. Despite shooting 50 percent from the floor in the opening frame and heading into the locker room up 35-29 at the half, the Minutemen went limp on defense in the second set and allowed the visiting Friars to pull away.

"We didn't guard anybody in the second half," said UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint. "Guys didn't get out on their shooters; we let them pop up and hit wide open jump shots until they got back in it."

Shot selection was another thorn in the home team's side in the second half, as All-American shooting guard Monty Mack bricked seven-straight field goal attempts over a span of 11 minutes.

The Friars bounced back from a 35.5 percent field goal performance in the opening set to shoot 54.8 percent from the floor (62.5 percent from beyond the three-point arch) in the decisive second half.

"I thought they hit a lot of tough shots in the second half," said Mack, who finished with a game-high 19 points on 6-of-19 shooting. "We came out and took a lot of quick shots and they came back and scored off of them."

The first half saw some of UMass' most inspired play of the young season, as the team reversed some trends that had been troublesome. The Minutemen sunk 5-of-6 free throws and out-rebounded the Friars 20-15 over the game's first 20 minutes, two areas where the Maroon and White had been thoroughly outclassed thus far this year.

"We did everything that I thought we needed to do," said UMass center Kitwana Rhymer, who posted a double-double with 16 points and 10 rebounds and tied a career-high with five blocks. "Some things just didn't go our way."

Rhymer and company owned the middle early against a seemingly advantaged Friar front. Providence twin towers

All hope is not lost for UMass

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Columnist

Hold on one minute if you were among the fans in attendance at the William D. Mullins Center yesterday, when the Providence Friars defeated the Massachusetts men's basketball team 85-70, and you're now ready to give up on the entire season.

There were actually positives to the game, and the 2000-01 campaign is not a lost cause, yet.

Yes, the Minutemen are now 1-4 with the hardest part of their schedule coming up. Yes, they were out rebounded once again, although this time it was only by a single board. Yes, they committed too many turnovers and had too many wasted positions on the offensive end of the floor.

But all hope is not lost. For the first time since the Iona win, UMass had contributors from the frontcourt and the backcourt, as Kitwana Rhymer, Micah Brand and Winston Smith combined with Shannon Crooks and Monty Mack to form a quality five-player lineup. In fact, all five players were able to reach double digits, and the formidable frontcourt gave the Friars fits in the first half.

"Smith, Brand and Rhymer were kicking our butts on the inside [in the first half]," Providence coach Tim Welsh said. "As they continue to get better the team will also get better."

The play of Smith especially frustrated Welsh going into the locker room at halftime, as his 10 points were a big part of the 35-29 lead the Maroon and White were able to muster.

"Smith was the guy I was concerned about," Welsh said. "He had not played that well before from what I had seen. But he is a tough kid and he got his 10 points because he out-toughed us. He was the guy I was upset about because he worked harder than us in the first half."

From the get-go, Smith decided to establish himself offensively, as he took it hard to the hole for two only four minutes into the game. By the time the first frame had ended, he had scored on a wide variety of moves that had the Massachusetts faithful wondering whether this was the same Smith that had been held scoreless by both Holy Cross and Marquette.

With 6:37 left in the half, he drilled a 12-footer with a man in his face for his fifth and sixth points of the evening. Then, he flew through the air to tip home a Rhymer miss,

Minutemen limp to Buckeye country

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Two years and four starters removed from a Final Four appearance, the Ohio State Buckeyes will provide a critical test for the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

Unfortunately, the Minutemen need more than a test - they need a win.

The Maroon and White will head into Sunday's five o'clock contest with the Buckeyes after falling to Providence College 85-70 at the Mullins Center. It was a painful loss, due to the fact that it dropped the team to 1-4 going into its toughest portion of the schedule.

"We needed a win to get some confidence, I'm not going to lie to you about that," said Head Coach James "Bruiser" Flint in reference to the game against the Friars. "And we didn't get it."

In the month of December, UMass will hit the road in order to take on Ohio State, UConn, Boston University and North Carolina, in addition to sneaking in a game at home against Boston College. With the exception of BU, all of these teams are national powerhouses, and the Maroon and White have the very real risk of being a lowly 2-8 before the conference portion of the schedule begins.

And all of this losing has the team shaken up.

"We never had losing streaks like this before," said guard Monty Mack. "We have to just put it behind us – we still have a long season to go."

"Everybody on this team has talent," added center Kitwana Rhymer. "Everybody knows we are good. Things just don't go our way sometimes, but we will never give up on each other."

To make matters worse, there has not been just one problem that the Minutemen need to solve. The team rebounding has been pretty bad. Foul shooting has been atrocious at times. Defensive lapses have appeared much more often than Flint would like. In fact, UMass has yet to play in a game where everything has clicked.

For this reason, the Maroon and White did not really have an answer for what it needs to work on in practice.

"Every game has been something different," said Mack. "We have to work on everything in practice, especially on defense."

"We are losing tough games," added Flint. "I have a good group and we have some talented players. We just have to pull ourselves out of this."

For Jim O'Brien's Ohio State squad, the Maroon and White will also be a tough test. So far this season the 4-2 Buckeyes have picked up wins against Yale, Florida State, Denver and Eastern Kentucky; not exactly the nation's elite.

Brian Brown leads the team, averaging 17.4 points per game, while Ken Johnson, Zach Williams and Boban Savovic also contribute, scoring 10.2, 9.8 and 9.0 ppg respectively.

On defense, Johnson is one of the top shot blockers in the nation and has already totaled 19 blocks this year.

UMass looks to re-"Fri" PC

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

Last year the Massachusetts hockey team dominated Providence College. The Minutemen swept the season series with the Friars collecting three of their five Hockey East wins.

Heading into tonight's game, the Maroon and White has dropped five games in a row and is winless in its last eight outings.

With memories of last year in mind, PC looks to be just what the doctor ordered for a struggling UMass [3-10-2, 3-3-0 HE] squad.

The Minutemen are coming off a weekend sweep at the hands of Boston University. Prior to the series the Terriers were on a six-game losing skid, the longest in Head Coach Jack Parker's career. BU turned its losing ways around and the Maroon and White will be looking to do the same when they travel to Providence.

Providence comes into the contest having split a weekend series with Merrimack College. Friday night the Warriors dumped the Friars, 4-1, but the following night they rebounded with a 7-3 trouncing at the Volpe Complex.

The Friars are currently ranked No. 9 in the nation and have compiled an overall mark of 8-3-3, with a number of impressive wins under their collar so far this season. The win that really put PC on the map was a 5-3 triumph over Maine on Nov. 3, in which Devin Rask tallied his first career hat trick in the win.

Rask has paced the Friars thus far posting a team-high 18 points. The sophomore has netted eight goals and assisted on Defense could win weekend

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

They stand in the corner, gloves on, ready to take on the world – they're ready to fight.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (3-3) is looking to end a two game losing streak, but it won't be easy. UMass takes on two top-notch programs this weekend, with James Madison University tonight and No.7 Rutgers on Sunday.

The good news for UMass is that JMU hasn't won on the road yet and the Minutewomen haven't lost at home so far this season; the Mullins Center has been a lucky arena for the Maroon and White. The bad news is that the Dukes bring a balanced and dangerous scoring attack and have proven to out rebound their opponents consistently this season.

Shanna Price, Nadine Morgan and Stacey Todd each average double-digit points, and UMass will have to play strong 'D' to contain them.

"We're very similar," Head Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "They have two kids who score very well. I think it's going to be a battle of wills. I feel very comfortable going against them; it's going to be a matter of execution."

UMass will face another top 15-ranked team again this Sunday. No. 7 Rutgers enters the Pioneer Valley looking to crush UMass at 2 p.m., but the Maroon and White have other plans. The Rutgers game will be an opportunity for UMass to prove to the women's hoops world that its team is capable of playing much better than it did last weekend in California. But UMass will have to bring its 'A' game if it is going to win.

Rutgers isn't ranked No.7 by the USA Today/ ESPN experts for nothing – they can play. Karlitia Washington leads the Scarlet Knights with over 13 points per contest and Tasha Pointer averages over 12 points while leading the squad with 6 boards per game.

"They're a very strong and physical team," O'Brien said. "We're going to have to come with everything we've got. We got to match their intensity. They like to pound it in and penetrate."

UMass has a lot to prove. The Minutewomen came back from California with two hard losses, in which they couldn't put up many points while being outscored drastically. The outside shot, a problem that nagged last year's team, is struggling again this year. O'Brien needs someone to step up and hit the perimeter jumper, and so far, no

SGA discusses multiple proposals

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Last Friday, members of the Greek community met with the Student Government Association to discuss the future of the Greek community and where they will stand within the area governments.

The meeting specifically focused on Title Five and brought forth a series of proposals of possible ideas, which would include the Greek community within the area governments.

Title Five, a new addition to the SGA constitution as of this year, defines the area government and it's house councils. However, this failed to define and include the placement of the Greek community within an area government. Secretary of Administrative Affairs, Sheila Tunney, brought forth two proposals to be taken under consideration at the meeting.

"We can look into instituting a Greek council and have them fall under the commuter area government or have them under the off campus university approved housing area government," Tunney said. "We could also have a Greek council and a representative from each house which would intern represent all the Greek area government and serve to consecutively bring everyone together."

The idea of forming a Greek Area Government was also brought up as a possible proposal, as well as the option for Greek houses on campus to create there own proposals to be taken under consideration.

"I think one step that we could look into would be putting together a packet on how each proposal would work," SGA President Jeff Howe said. "We would then distribute these packets to each house and they could review the pros and cons of each and give feedback on what they think would be the best course of action."

However, Director of Greek Affairs Michael Wiseman offered a different proposal to the SGA. He stated that he would like to set up a coordinating council including the four Greek governing councils so that each would receive representation.

"If we had a representative from each area of the Greek community we could elect a chair for each term that way the position would rotate between each group," Wiseman said. "This would allow everyone the ability to be involved and get equal representation as well as the chance to take the lead and be the primary contact for the SGA."

One concern expressed by Greek Affairs was the not only getting representation for recognized Greek houses on campus, but specifically those who are less publicized as well.

The idea of Greek students living on campus, under one area of government and then being apart of another, was also under discussion. Questions over who Greek students living on campus would be directed under were looked at by the SGA. The issue of whether or not Greeks living on campus would be represented twice was a concern brought up by both sides. Howe responded by stating "We don t have a proportional government."

Wiseman expressed his thoughts on the issues concerning Title Five in relationship to the Greek community and what there intentions are as a whole.

"Our intent is not to serve the Greek communities needs, but the SGA and whatever legalities needed so that

UMPD reports online fraud increase

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

With the holiday season right around the corner, students have to be careful when buying merchandise from online sources such as eBay, the University of Massachusetts Police Department warns.

According to Officer Peter Murray of the UMPD, the department has been dealing with a greater volume of incidents of online fraud in the past couple months. Although fraud incidents of this type are often reported to Online Information Technologies (OIT), both organizations work closely together to try to prevent crimes of this type.

In order to try locate the perpetrators of online crimes, the department goes through a number of steps in order to establish contact. They attempt to call the suspect at the last given address, contact the police department in the suspect's hometown and check with other police stations on the possibility that the suspect may have a record of these type of crime.

"These cases have really taken a lot of our time and resources to investigate," Murray said.

Some of the types of items involved in the recent fraud cases have ranged from laptops to a cell phones and in severe cases $1,500 in financial losses occurred.

Murray explained that often times many things that are purchased online could be acquired in a store for often times the equivalent cost. However, he cautioned, consumers need to use their best judgement when they are buying a product anywhere.

"Students just need to use the same common sense if they are buying something online as they would if they were buying something in a store," he said.

One factor that typically surrounds online fraud is that the seller insists upon a cash payment rather than a credit card, Murray explained. Often times, rewards such as a discount or an additional merchandise are offered in exchange for cash. If a cash payment or a payment by check is received, it is more difficult to both trace and to recover monetary losses in cases of fraud.

"When you send a check and it is cashed you can put a stop payment

UConn officials respond to statements on anti-abortion sentiments from group

By Colleen Potter
The Daily Campus (U. Connecticut)

(U-WIRE) STORRS, Conn. – In a press release issued Nov. 14, WhyLife?, a religiously affiliated division of the anti-abortion group American Life League, said that the University of Connecticut, along with more than 30 other colleges and universities on the eastern seaboard had "formed a blockade against the RU-486 regimen...All conclude that the RU-486 regimen is lethal, dangerous, complicated and controversial... These colleges have just said 'No!' to the RU-486 regimen."

"That is absolutely not true," said Michele LaBonte, women's clinic coordinator at UConn. "We've actually had two practitioners and a doctor attend seminars on the RU-486 regimen so that we will be well-schooled on the program."

In the press release, Cathy Brown, director of WhyLife?, said that 30 colleges and universities have allegedly blocked RU-486, the abortion pill, because of "the deadly interaction of the two chemicals involved."

The two chemicals she referred to are Mifeprex and Cytotec. She said that the company Searle, Cytotec's manufacturer, has warned against the use of Cytotec because it may cause death to the mother. An operator from Searle, who asked not to be named, said that Cytotec is specifically labeled for ulcer prevention and there are no plans to test its use for anything else.

Brown, who conducted the phone survey of the colleges and universities, told The Daily Campus that most schools didn't perform the RU-486 regimen for "logistical" reasons. There was "too much equipment and too many personnel needed," she said.

LaBonte clarified UConn's position.

"We don't have the facilities on campus to provide the appropriate care for the RU-486 regimen, but we are committed to providing options for all of our students. If they feel the RU-486 regimen is the choice for them, we are prepared to refer her to a safe and clinically sound place that will perform the procedure. We will probably never provide the regimen on campus, but that does not mean we have 'banned' it."

The Food and Drug Administration, which approved Mifeprex in late September, says on its Web site that "the benefits of this drug outweigh its risks."

Mifepristone, the drug's clinical name, is authorized to be administered within 49 days of the woman's last menstrual period, and is taken in two steps. On the first day, the woman must sign a consent form and then take three tablets of Mifeprex in the presence of a doctor. On the third day, if the fetus has not already been expelled, the woman must take two tablets of Misopristone. On the 14th day, the woman must complete either an ultrasound or gynecological exam to make sure that the fetus has been completely removed. If not, a surgical procedure may be necessary to complete the abortion.

Getting pumped for finals tonight in Campus Center

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

With finals looming in sight, many students feel stressed and overwhelmed; "Getting Pumped for Finals," an event held by E.I.M and Associates, seeks to alleviate their problem.

The motivational and inspirational event will be hosted by Donna R. Ivy, the president of the corporation, and will be held in Campus Center Room 903 at 6 p.m. today.

Elm "is committed to providing services that supports personal empowerment in a professional world. Our intention is to be all things for all people and help our world to be a better place," the organization's mission statement reads.

The group works with businesses to improve communication with one another by discussing issues that are difficult to put forth without consequences, building a group of people that are capable of working together as a team and addressing and embracing diversity within businesses.

The organization also deals with recruitment and retention, strategic planning and meeting with difficult topics. Ivy originally founded the organization as a tribute to her mother and has recently worked with over twenty organizations in the area on a variety of topics.

Ivy was recently recognized by the City of Springfield and honored by the YWCA of Western Massachusetts as one of the YWCA Women of Achievement. The group seeks to recognize outstanding women in the community for both their personal and professional contributions to their work and community.

In addition, she also received a special recognition from the Martin Luther King Jr. Community Center as one of the 25 Black Women of Achievement in 1994 during an exhibit entitled "I Dream A World." She was also honored by the Department of Mental Retardation's Springfield Area Office team as the group's best director, and has been actively involved in St. John's Congregational Church and in several community involvement committees.

She received a Bachelor of Arts from Ramapo College in New Jersey and her Masters Degree in Education from Cambridge College. In addition, she has also had over 20 years of experience working with businesses in the administrative field.

As a way to help both individuals and businesses with some of their work related problems, we can work together side by side," Wiseman said.

Guerra added on to Wiseman's comment by stating that the Greeks will always have issues and they will deal with them as they had before, but it's about being able to satisfy the needs of the SGA in this situation.

Chris Carey of Pi Lambda Phi expressed his chapters concerns over receiving equal representation as a new chapter. He expressed concerns over the fact that some Greek chapters do not have houses, and the need to reach every area of the Greek community.

"As a new chapter we want to know that were represented, where we stand and what we will be able to get out of it," Carey said.

Pan Hellenic President Amy Guerra added on to this by explaining that a lot of students are not educated on the entire process.

"We have had many discussions, and it's not that we don't want a proposal to be made, but people are not educated enough leaving us taking guesses on what our chapter wants," Guerra said.

It was further discussed on making a proposal that would suit the growth of the Greek community. Wiseman stated that he would like to see a plan created that would incorporate and include a growing Greek community.

"The Greek community wants support, and there has been a lot of talk about expanding," Wiseman said. "You don't want to have to revisit this topic again in the future."

Howe responded by stating that he would like to see a system that would reflect a growing population as well. He then moved on to state what the next course of action would be for Title Five.

"We need to talk about the general structure of what is going to happen, and then have everything ready to go when we get back next semester," Howe said.

on it, but it won't do anything," Murray said.

Another thing that online buyers should be wary about is addresses that include a suite number or a PO box.

Murray explained that these could easily be created through companies such as Mailboxes Etc. and then closed down following a online sales transaction.

"Even a real residential address doesn't mean anything, but it is safer than a PO box," Murray said. "And, we cannot charge these people if we cannot find them."

Anyone that is the victim of an online crime should contact the police department to report it.

"It is important that a student report the incident so that we can try to work on it," Murray said. "And so that we can get a tally about how many of these crimes occur to students on campus."

Amherst reviews athletics

By Elizabeth Wright
Swarthmore Phoenix (Swarthmore College)

(U-WIRE) SWARTHMORE, Pa. – Amherst College has assembled a committee to examine its athletic program and look at athletic issues "nearly identical to the issues Swarthmore has been struggling with," according to Amherst Board of Trustees member Colin Diver, chairman of the Committee on the Place of Athletics at Amherst (CPAA).

"The scope of the jurisdiction of the committee is pretty broad," Diver said, explaining that the committee will look at questions concerning not only specific sports, but also the impact the athletic program has on academics, admissions priorities and overall college life.

The committee will also look at the credentials and aptitudes of athletes, the time demands sports place on them, the tendency of athletes to self-segregate on campus, as well as recruitment practices used in the admissions process.

"Obviously, concrete issues are also at hand," Diver said. "The place of football is always the most salient issue in inquiries like this."

"The specific issue of whether to drop football altogether, it's fair to say, is one of the options that has been suggested, but is not being actively considered," Diver said.

He added that the committee will "probably end up making recommendations of an incremental nature."

The composition and charge of this committee are very similar to the Athletic Review Committee at Swarthmore that presented the recommendation adopted by the Board of Managers this Saturday to cut football, badminton and wrestling.

The CPAA was appointed by Amherst president Tom Gerety at the beginning of this school year to conduct an extensive review of many facets of athletics at Amherst, and is slated to submit a report at the end of the school year, most likely at the annual meeting of the college trustees in May.

The committee consists of faculty, students and members of the board of trustees.

Assistant Director of Sports Information Steve Vladeck said the issue of the role of sports at Amherst has emerged has been one of the largest recurring campus issues during the last couple of years, and has been an ongoing debate for much longer.

The Amherst committee was formed in part as a follow-up to a report released in September 1999 by a separate college committee that detailed admissions practices over a five-year period from 1994 to 1999 and charged that the admissions office often went too far in sacrificing academic standards for athletes.

Athletics expanded dramatically at Amherst after the New England Small College Athletic Conference lifted its ban on participation in NCAA tournaments in 1993. After that, "things exploded," according to Vladeck, with the addition of more sports, increased recruiting and an increase in the winning percentage of Amherst teams.

After Amherst's football team went through a three-year losing streak in the mid-90s, however, further adjustments were made to football recruiting. Amherst Athletic Director Peter Gooding called these adjustments "too aggressive."

"People have said that the class of '98 was admitted for the sole purpose of beating Williams at football," Vladeck said.

These admissions processes have been reversed, according to both Gooding and Vladeck, but much of the debate on campus about the role of athletics can be traced to the report.

Gooding said that protecting the integrity of the academic program while allowing athletic teams to be competitive is always an ongoing process.

"Amherst wrestles with these issues all the time. It's always going to be a challenge," he said.

To help improve the balance between academics and athletics, Amherst has pursued measures to lower the athletic competition within its conference such as supporting the creation of a new conference rule that will cap football squads at 75 players.

Vladeck said there has been a "concerted effort to cut back slowly on the number of athletic admits we have."

The number of recruited athletes has topped 20 percent in recent years, according to Diver. At issue, Diver said, is "not having to step too far down into the applicant pool to get the next lineman."

Amherst has 27 varsity teams, and 40 percent of the 1,868-member student body participates in varsity athletics. According to Gooding, Amherst uses a "reasonably well-defined" slot system for a "relatively small number" of athletes in each entering class.

According to Diver, the committee is also considering recommending a "numbers cap" on recruited athletes similar to the 10 to 15 percent number voted on last Friday by Swarthmore's Board of Managers.

"One of the big concerns is trying to determine what that number should look like and how we could justify a particular number," Diver said.

"The real question here is reconciling school size with athletic program size," Vladeck said.

At Amherst, Vladeck said, the debate centers on the so-called "helmet sports," which are football, hockey and lacrosse. Football in particular requires a large number of highly specialized male athletes.

"Like Swarthmore, about 10 percent of our male student body plays football," Vladeck said.

These sports often shoulder the blame when complaints are expressed about Amherst athletics, yet at the same time, Vladeck said, "these are some of our proudest, oldest programs. The trustees would be very reluctant to cut them."

Trendy drugs ecstasy, PMA pose potentially fatal threat

By Jennifer Wig
Daily Egyptian (Southern Illinois U.)

(U-WIRE) CARBONDALE, Ill. – Lights flashing, bass thudding and people milling about with lollipops in their mouths. It's a rave.

The use of club drugs among college students – particularly ecstasy – continues to increase, as evidenced by a pair of raves that have taken place in the Carbondale area this semester.

"Everybody is rolling these days," said "Jane," a sophomore in administration of justice from Chicago. "People who won't even smoke weed will do it because they were always told, 'don't smoke weed.' Nobody talked about ecstasy. No one knows how bad it is."

Ecstasy pills are now the third most popular drug in the Chicago suburbs, according to a June 11 Daily Herald article. In 1998, 3.6 percent of high school seniors reported using ecstasy in the last year. In 1999, the number rose to 5.2 percent.

Although many young people seem to believe that ecstasy is a safe club drug to experiment with, Methylenedioxymethamphetamine, or MDMA, has long-term negative effects.

MDMA is the drug known as ecstasy, X, Adam and e. MDMA was used by psychiatrists as a therapeutic tool until it was made illegal in 1985.

MDMA produces a relaxed, euphoric state but no hallucinations. Those who take ecstasy have an increased sense of touch and empathy. Usually in pill form, the drug can be mixed with other drugs, increasing the dangers.

Jane, who has been attending raves for four years and has done ecstasy for two, is well aware of the harmful potential of the drug, but said it "improves a lot of people" by making them more open. The drug is known for making people more talkative and friendly, while users "roll" from the effects of the drug.

According to Jane, after trying X a few times, shy people become more communicative even when not rolling.

"It opens a part of them," she said.

Physically, MDMA increases the heart rate, blood pressure and body temperature. Those who use ecstasy can become dehydrated if they do not drink fluids.

Because MDMA is easily detectable by canines, it is easier to smuggle adulterated forms of ecstasy into the country. One of those forms, paramethoxyamphetamine, or PMA, is similar to ecstasy but much more lethal. It is also cheaper to make PMA, which is produced in illicit labs. Although it costs less than $1 to make a pill, ecstasy sells on the street for $20 to $45 per pill.

PMA is classified as a hallucinogen. Doses as low as 60 milligrams (ecstasy doses are usually 50 to 75 milligrams) can cause a significant increase in blood pressure, body temperature and pulse. When mixed with other drugs and alcohol, the drug becomes more potent.

The effects of PMA include an increase in energy, minor visuals, a general change in consciousness, pupil dilation, erratic eye movements, muscles spasms, increased blood temperature, increased blood pressure, increased body temperature, increased pulse rate, labored breathing, nausea, vomiting, convulsions, coma and death.

PMA was related to three deaths in the Chicago suburbs this summer. The form taken in those cases is called "Mitsubishi" ecstasy because it is a white pill with the three triangles of the Japanese car company stamped on the front.

A Dec. 1 Chicago Tribune article stated that the DuPage County state's attorney's office delivered a public-nuisance letter to the Naperville-area club, Zero Gravity. A 1999 police bust on the club confiscated drugs including cocaine, marijuana and ecstasy.

PMA increases the body temperature up to 108 degrees and the body is unable to cool itself down.

"When the blood temperature gets that high it starts to literally boil your brain," said Douglas Smith, associate professor in psychology. "It inhibits sweating, which is the body's way of cooling itself, and these kids are going out and dancing their brains out, getting hot and not drinking water.

"They not only become dehydrated they also become hypothermic and once that happens they start blowing strokes, having internal bleeding."

"One of the real problems is, once it does [kick in] it's 10 to 30 times more potent than ecstasy. People sometimes think it's not working so they'll take more."

MDMA increases the body temperature, but usually only to about 104 degrees. As long as users drink water, they are only suffering from a high fever, but PMA can "microwave" a person, cooking them from the inside out.

There are testing kits on the market that can test the purity of ecstasy, by checking for the amount of MDMA in the pill. The kit contains a chemical that, when placed on a small scraping of ecstasy, will change color to indicated the presence of certain drugs.

As with most drugs, alcohol increases the effects, but alcohol should not be mixed with either MDMA or PMA because it compounds the negative aspects of overheating and dehydration, possibly leading to death.

Death from PMA is not pleasant, the victim often suffering hours of incoherence and convulsions. Even a cold bath will not cool the body temperature. Chronic use of MDMA can produce long-term damage to serotonin-containing neurons, affecting emotion, memory, sleep and pain. It can also cause muscle breakdown and kidney and cardiovascular system failure, leading to heart attacks, strokes and seizures in some users. MDMA is detectable in the urine for about two to four days.

Smith teaches a class about the biological and psychological effects of recreational drugs. Smith has discussed PMA and MDMA in his class, informing his students about recent PMA deaths linked to Mitsubishi ecstasy. After class, two of his students who had recently seen Mitsubishi ecstasy approached him.

"One of them told me yes they had seen it. Another told me 'not only have I seen it, I've taken it,'" he said.

Ecstasy users could suffer a maximum sentence of seven years imprisonment and an unlimited fine for possession. For supplying the drug, the maximum sentence is life imprisonment and an unlimited fine.

Jane goes to raves just for the music and although there are drugs available, she said people should not classify the scene as solely geared toward drug use until they have experienced it for themselves.

She does not buy drugs at the parties because "you never know what's in it."

MDMA is often mixed with drugs such as cocaine and speed to mold it into its pressed form as a pill. Jane has tried ecstasy about nine times, including a Mitsubishi pill, but is confident she will not receive PMA. Instead, she attributes recent deaths to a bad batch.

Jane is not surprised that ecstasy and the rave scene have crept toward Southern Illinois, believing the amount of students from St. Louis and Chicago living in Carbondale is high enough to generate the interest, especially in a town where drugs such as alcohol and marijuana are already prevalent.

An apology to our readers

The Daily Collegian would like to sincerely apologize to our readers. The sad fact is that internal Collegian politics have made it onto the printed page, and this is unacceptable. We endeavor to never have it happen again.

The Collegian, as a whole, is comprised of dozens upon dozens of students. Each and every one is different. They work in different parts of the paper (business, newsroom, graphics), they perform different tasks within those departments (day graphics/night graphics, Ed/Op, Arts, ad rep/payroll), and, finally, each has views and opinions that are entirely independent of their position.

This disparity of view between individuals creates a certain tension behind the scenes. This is inevitable. What is not inevitable, what is absolutely expected, is that this sort of conflict remains behind the scenes.

The Collegian had its semester elections this past week. Bitterness over the election on the part of certain staffers crept into the horoscopes in this past Friday's paper. This we apologize for.

Personal games and agendas have made it into the fillers that we place in the paper. This we apologize for.

This column that you are reading, unsigned, and meant to represent the majority opinion of the newspaper and all its associates, has been used to further personal goals. It has been used as a tool in inter-departmental conflict. It has been disregarded and used as a vessel for bad jokes. This we apologize for.

Although some students and others on campus who are less than pleased with coverage may disagree, the Collegian is here to serve the students. We do not serve you with propaganda or with blind catering to anyone who comes to our office to demand a certain story, but by attempting to be as impartial, accurate, and informative as possible. We try to give the students on this campus a better idea of what is going on around them, be it via humorous editorial pieces, an investigative news story, or a straight-ahead sports wrap up.

This overall purpose never leaves our minds. We are, however, human, and sometimes an individual will find a way to get their opinion through our editing process and onto the page, where it does you, the reader, no help at all, and us unalterable harm.

When our politics get printed on the page you are not served. We are not saying that it will never happen again; in fact, odds are that, at least someday, it will.

We cannot ever promise to you that it won't happen again, but we can say that, as a whole, we are taking steps to ensure that it will be as minimal as possible. We ask only that you bear with us, laugh if you wish, but don't think that we are intentionally disrespecting you with inside jokes or ridiculous statements.

We are sorry for any discomfort or aggravation that these slip-ups have caused you in your reading experience.

From now on, we'll do or best to keep it behind the scenes.

Excellence in reach?

I wanted to comment on the article run recently noting that UMass is considering making laptops a requirement. I agree with the reasons the Collegian states and will go further and say I strongly disagree with any policy of the type. Computers are tools and like any tool, you have to be taught how to use it. You can be taught how to use a computer without spending obscene amounts of money to get one. I think this is a very misguided and shallow attempt on the part of the administration to fix a problem with technology literacy.

It would seem this measure is being considered because they want to make the student body of the state more computer friendly. I can talk with some experience on that matter because I was a computer "wizard" in high school, worked at a computer job for the past two years and have also worked for OIT here at UMass. The idea of making people more computer friendly is certainly laudable, but the method used is extremely shoddy. I do not know the specifics of any plan here, but I suppose the implication here is that if you buy a computer then you will be computer friendly. Being computer literate is entirely a mental thing, and like all mental things, it cannot be bought. Becoming computer friendly is a matter of being taught how to use one and have access to one. If they want to ensure everyone has access to a computer then I think the proper action is to expand the amount of public computer labs. It seems to me (even as I write this in one) that computer labs follow the general rule of thumb at UMass: If it exists then it is busy. What would be a more appropriate measure would be to make computer literacy a general education requirement that could be exempted from in a test similar to the RI requirement. That way they could insure people learn about computers without putting that much more of a financial strain on them.

SCOTT KANE

Also, as a person who knows about computers. I find the term "knows how to use a computer" extremely ambiguous. Knows how to use a computer to do what? Unless you are interested in computers in themselves, computers are just an information tool. There are some basic things to learn like a very general notion of what is going on inside a computer, how a particular operating system works, and how to find things on the Internet. Beyond that, things like applications change from time to time (by design – they are products and need to be sold) and so what really needs to be taught is how to learn. The main reason people do not know about computers is not because they are mysterious, it is because they are scared of them or because they simply don't care to know. To teach a computer class the way I fear it would be taught would be rote memorization of commands and specific tasks in specific applications. That isn't teaching; that is training.

I am going to propose something that would seem very radical coming from a math major. Humanities need to be stressed more. A few months back I ran across an article in the Massachusetts humanities newsletter in which a man proposed the idea that the most practical education is a liberal arts education. His theory went something like this: humanities teach you how to think qualitatively and critically. Thinking is the basic skill needed in all other subjects (such as computer literacy). Without a strong thinking ability, science oriented subjects become memorization of formulas and such for the test without any understanding of the concept. Also, even if humanities didn't enrich your learning ability in science, they would be well worth the effort of teaching for what they can do for people's worldview and interpersonal skills. In short, the point I am trying to make is this: if you want a superior technological work force, teach humanities early and science later. As for the bias against liberal arts at this University, I think that it is somewhat justified. Massachusetts has two colleges dedicated to the arts but zero dedicated to science & technology. There isn't even an engineering program at any state college. This is the one of the only state schools where science is dominate.

Also to see this from a financial viewpoint if UMass is supposed to be "Excellence within your reach" the cost of laptops could very well put that out of reach. Would these laptops have to be up to certain specifications? If so who says what minimum specifications make a computer useful? To iterate the comment in the collegian's previous article: laptops are not cheap! Even a cheap laptop costs $1200 and can range to over $2500. Would these laptops have to, or even suggested, to be bought from a certain location? If that was the case I cannot help but cynically wonder if there isn't a lobbyist for a computer manufacturer who has the ears of an individual in the administration. The required purchase of well over 20,000 laptops a year is no small commission. I can testify as a math major I would have very little use for a laptop for schoolwork. I barely use my calculator any more but I do have to think every day. I think what the most likely scenario here would be that there would be a lot of people buying a machine they barely ever used and going into dept to do it. All of this because of some misguided administrators. If the state wants a more technology oriented workforce then they should teach them how to think and learn with humanities and then make computer literacy a general education requirement. I reject out of hand any notion that a thing can make you learn. Even in today's highly materialistic society, knowledge cannot be bought at any price.

Screachin' and preachin': Revs. Seth and Shawn duel

REV. SHAWN DOWNS

I sometimes question the effectiveness of my position. Am I Boo Downs, somewhat renowned Collegian Columnist, or Shawn Downs, 21-year-old college student on an ego trip? I'm usually not ignorant enough on a subject to generate any sort of productive backlash. So what should I do to up my credentials so that people will heed my words? Of course, I'll become an ordained minister!

After a few clicks on my computer, an e-mail or two and my full name, I was formally ordained a minister in the Universal Life Church. I don't feel any different, but now I have an official certificate in the mail. So I am now legally a minister, with rights pertaining thereof. Did I spend years of training to become a Priest or a Rabbi? No, I spent five minutes. As a legal revered, I have a title and the moral authority to preach morality to the masses. Last week, I could only preach my views on social issues. Now I can preach with style.

Have I seen the light? Has this position brought infinite wisdom or virtue to my being? Should you take me more seriously? Of course not. To take me more seriously just on the account of this title is nothing more than shallow faith. People will flock, as the title "Reverend Shawn Downs" has a weight that "Collegian Columnist Boo Downs" lacks. With a strong religious influence to our culture, the title carries prestige, intelligence, and wisdom. Does this title do anything to actually make me intelligent, wise, and prestigious? My apologies to the Presidential candidates, but it's the person, not the title, which carries the favorable traits in their position.

It is written in the Book of Boo that, "Self-righteousness is the greatest ignorance." We the people give people authority over us. We invest some of our freedoms in our government, and we invest our lifestyles into religious institutions. In return, these institutions are supposed to provide us with securities. Our elected officials are supposed to serve the people. Likewise, religious institutions are supposed to answer some fundamental life questions, and to provide us hope in times of hardship and ultimately at the hour of our death. When this system works, we benefit and prosper from our investment. When money and power are involved, whose best interests are actually being served?

I fear that too many people are using the mantle of God to hawk their own, material interests rather than encouraging spirituality and a healthy lifestyle. With Hollywood cashing in on our beliefs in a number of badly made movies, religious leaders enjoying favored political status, and television preachers selling hope, one could wonder what happened to old fashioned beliefs. Simple spiritual relationships between people and their respective deities/philosophies are overshadowed by huge organizations, spoon-fed mass culture, and commercialism. While many people sincerely have strong religious beliefs, the religious system as a whole has become watered down.

The last time I checked, Jesus never had his own cable network. Abraham didn't own a Hollywood studio and Muhammad would never bomb anybody. However, there are plenty of Jesus network specials, neurotic Jews in the movies, and fundamentalist terrorists in the news. Religious founders are celebrated in today's religion, but they as historical people had to suffer to get their message across. Once established, these creeds still had suffer through persecution. What about the Pagans, who suffered immensely both because of their worship of Nature and their gender? Countless innocents have been massacred and persecuted in the name of Institutional religion. I, both an upper middle class white male and an official Reverend or a Christian church will never suffer like the Pagans or Jews or Muslims or any persecuted faith.

If any of these historical people came back today, I would be certain that they would be shocked and dismayed at what they saw. Judaism and Islam, both related and supposed to co-exist, are destroying each other in Israel. Christianity and Islam, also supposed to co-exist, clashed during the Crusades, where thousands died in the turmoil. Judaism and Christianity, directly related (Jesus was a Jew after all), have been at odds for centuries. These three major religions, the progression of the same line of thinking, have been at each other's throats. So much for morality, welcome to hypocrisy.

Spirituality, appreciating a greater unknown world around us, is inherently good. Due to human frailties, the message becomes flawed. In this, large, institutional religion is then inherently flawed. History speaks to this over and over again.

Does this mean that you should abandon institutional religion? Of course not. In fact, some of the wisest and most benevolent people I've ever met were priests from my local church. Religion is a focus of spirituality, not a political machine. Each creed has its own rituals that satisfy that focus. However, to implement these beliefs into secular arenas (e.g. politics) and to force others to partake in those beliefs betrays the foundation in which religion is founded.

I have preached enough, which seems to befit my position. However, I know that having some title does not give me any more authority that what I already have. I will hang my certificate on the wall as a reminder that this is yet another excess in a world bent on excesses. And that's the Gospel Truth.

Rev. Shawn Downs is a Collegian Columnist

I had to smile when I saw it. There in front of me, as I stepped forth to release the biological tension caused by 20 oz. of coffee ingested earlier that morning, was an ingeniously placed advertisement.

At the base of the public urinal was a rubber filter bearing the logo for "CampusNut.com."

You can't help but see it, and the name of the website is humorously close to, well, your "campus nuts." Those advertising folks are getting more and more creative every day – pretty soon there will be Pepsi slogans on the insides of peoples' reading glasses.

Regardless, the whole experience got me thinking about the society that we live in and how much influence advertising has. Some extremely important scientific study that was very professionally done claimed that more children today recognize the McDonald's Golden Arches before they do the Christian Cross.

I don't know if that's true or not. If it is, I'm quite sure it has something to do with the fact that not only does the Vatican not offer Happy Meals, but it also comes up short on the quality of its french fries.

The whole flowing robe and fatherly beard look is great for Jesus, but it isn't nearly as marketable as Ronald McDonald's yellow jumpsuit and fire engine red hair.

The problem of religious exposure in this nation isn't a new one. Way back in the Dark Ages, Beatle headman John Lennon said of his band, "We're bigger than Jesus."

This goes without saying, of course, because Jesus never had a drummer, bassist or guitarist.

At some point in history, Jesus' followers employed a marketing scheme that involved handing out free promo copies of the Bible along with trial software for AOL. If the receiving heathen was already rather attached to his or her previous belief or, say, used Microsoft Network instead, the heathen would be tortured and killed along with all of his or her family members.

They called this strategy the "Crusades," but for all of its strengths, it forgot to put branch offices in Washington D.C. and Miami.

Ultimately, religion in this day-and-age needs some serious help, and because Christianity seems to be the only religion that exists in the minds of way too many Americans, I have decided to accept an extremely powerful position in Tucson, Arizona's Universal Life Church.

REV. SETH KOENIG

I, like my cohort, Boo, am now an ordained minister.

"How is this possible," you ask.

"They don't do background checks," I answer.

In all seriousness, a Church – that is, in fact, acknowledged as legitimate by our national government – is willing to ordain any Tom, Dick or Harry that comes down the pike. According to the Universal Life folks, the message of God should not be monopolized by a select few. The message of God is wonderful and should be spread by the common people out there.

The official card and authenticity package that certifies the right of a given common person to share the message of God is $29.00. If you'd rather be titled a "Mystic" or "Prophet" or something cool like that instead of "Minister," you must pay an extra $13.

Ah, well. That's the price you pay for being a child of God, I guess. If you go around talking about how inexpensive and convenient McDonalds' Extra Value Meals are, it's probably free. If you do it enough – and dress up in a yellow jumpsuit with fire-red hair – McDonald's may even pay you.

Something to think about, anyway, if the Basketweaving degree doesn't work out.

As it is, I, Reverend Seth Koenig, will be extremely effective as a messenger of God. On a given Monday in the Pioneer Valley, I'm read by 25,000 people or so. I'm only guessing, but I doubt 25,000 people peruse the Book of Job Monday morning.

For all of you out there that aren't bright enough to pick up the social commentary in all of this, I don't feel like putting it in children's terms, so keep reading the column until you get it. For starters, though, the point isn't actually that I prefer Ronald McDonald to Jesus Christ.

Although he does make better french fries.

Anger Management? Limp Bizkit rocks Hartford

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

ANGER MANAGEMENT TOUR with Limp Bizkit, Godsmack, DMX and Sinister Hartford Civic Center
Dec. 09

Godsmack, or even God himself for that matter, simply could not manage the irony that I was at Saturday night's Anger Management Tour. None-the-less, the heavily glorified national tour rolled through New England again, attempting to unite a generation of rage filled misfits with music (and $43.50 tickets).

Unlike the last time Anger Management was in the area when Eminem, Papa Roach and Xzibit joined Limp Bizkit, there was much less of an emphasis on the "anger" part of the tour, and more on the fact that it was a genuine rock show. In the three months that Limp Bizkit has been on tour promoting their new album, Chocolate Starfish and the Hot Dog Flavored Water, they have clearly evolved in almost every aspect of their performance style. The songs from the new album were played much better than they were at the beginning of the tour, and Limp Bizkit's lead singer, Fred Durst finally seems to have a grasp on how far his limits can actually be stretched before he has crossed the line.

At the last show that Bizkit put on in Worcester, Durst showed contempt for everything surrounding him. He disrespected the Worcester Centrum by asking all of the fans to rush the floor, causing chaos. He called Christina Aguilera a, "f—king Bitch." He babbled about how the Anger Management Tour was a cover-up for allowed violence and glorified it.

Saturday's performance by Bizkit was simply much different. Though the insane pyrotechnics and the stage, which included a forty foot tall transformer, and two accompanying robots was the same, Durst created a much more friendly atmosphere. He really came to play, much more than to make a statement.

In fact, one of the only times that he did use the microphone as a soap box was to perform an unknown song that he dedicated to Kid Rock's sidekick Joe C, who died last month. "We should be grateful we're alive," Durst proclaimed. The entire crowd rose and cheered.

Limp Bizkit played almost the exact same set as they did in Worcester. They opened with the fast paced, "Hot Dog" from the new album, and followed it with an unknown new song where Durst mentions former anger manager, Slim Shady.

After a long stint of radio hits that included "Rearranged," and "1999" from the band's second album Significant Other along with "Faith" and "Counterfeit" from their first, Three Dollar Bill, Durst brought a fan out of the crowd to bask in the glory of the stage with him on "My Way or the Highway." He similarly did the same thing at the MTV Music Video Awards with Christina Aguilera a few months back to the same song.

Much like every performance on the Anger Management Tour, Limp Bizkit brought out Mr. Wiggles, the break-dancer from the "Rollin" video to strut his moves for that song. The show ended with "Take a Look Around" from the Mission Impossible 2 soundtrack, and of course, what has become the staple Limp Bizkit closer, "Nookie."

Godsmack added their high-octane energy as a replacement to what Eminem carried for the first half of the tour. Though Godsmack put on a tremendous show, they simply did not develop the same vibe that Eminem had. When Eminem was on the bill, many fans went just to see him. It is doubtful that there were too many people in attendance willing to pay an extravagant price for a ticket to see Godsmack, even if the show was in their home area.

Godsmack's show was excellent. Their stage was extremely simple bearing two lions with gleaming eyes on both sides, and a huge banner with their name on it in the back. They opened with the extremely popular first single, "Awake," from their new album of the same title. "Awake" proved to be a very good choice for an opener. Their set was short and displayed only two songs from Awake, and a lot more from their first self title album. However, despite the brevity of the gig, lead singer Sully Erna was able to really get the crowd into it. He even had the quote of the night when he said, "This tour is so great. It brings all types of music together and people don't care about races. All racism is ignorant bullshit."

Erna has a distinct way to entice a crowd. He yells at them with his strong Boston accent, and demands response. The crowd almost always looks at him as the born leader of the stage. Throughout their set, it was the most recognizable Godsmack material provided the fans most fun. After a strong opening, they kicked into "Bad Religion" from the self-titled album, and the audience seemed to get louder.

Limp Bizkit came fully equipped with forty feet tall transformers, fireworks and flames as part of the Anger Management Tour this past Saturday night at the Hartford Civic Center.

Unfortunately, I was unable to see DMX's show. Which, while I have to floor, allow me to complain how pitiful the Hartford Civic Center is to see a show. While DMX was on stage, I was in a tunnel underground fighting to get the photographer into the show. The people behind the ticket counters were utter idiots, and the security guard who spent more time flirting with a representative from Hartford radio station WCCC than he did doing his job should be fired. He was rude and seemed to get a sadistic kick out of having people stand in the cold and worshiping his royal ability to get us into the show. It is his fault alone that I have no review of DMX, and if I could apologize to the rapper personally I would.

To make matters worse, unlike every venue in the entire country, the Hartford Civic Center will not allow photographers to watch the concert while they are not shooting. Not only did they not let the photographer stay for the show, but the nitwit in charge of photography at the Civic Center didn't even know which photo passes went for which band. Not one person at that arena cared in the least bit about what was going on, and no one was helpful. The Hartford Civic Center and everyone affiliated with it should be utterly ashamed of the way it operates. I urge anyone to think twice before seeing a show there.

As for me, and my repeat appearance at the Anger Management Tour, it was an uncomfortable experience to say the least. Like I mentioned before, I was certainly willing to have my anger managed when I was there, and what I got was even more distress. After fighting with the worthless employees of the Civic Center, I found myself pushing through a sea of people in the lobby unable to move. Lines for everything from T-shirts and food to free mobile phones intermeshed everywhere. The people seemed to come from almost everywhere. An overwhelming feeling of negligence seeped through the air. They all acted like immature hooligans just looking for a reason to start a fight. People were yelling at each other, and causing scenes in the hallways. There were radio stations blasting Beastie Boys songs, causing people to stand around and act as a massive obstacle impossible to break.

Anxiety filled in my chest as a fifteen year old punk with a red baseball cap blew cigarette smoke in my face. My eyes began to water, my head hurt and I couldn't see straight.

I am the least violent person alive, and would never fathom the thought of acting any differently. However, I felt trapped and alone and suddenly I felt the urge to do something that I have never done in my life before. I wanted to punch someone in that crowd, and I wanted to hurt them. Thankfully I didn't act on those desires.

Anger management? More like anger production.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Take care you do not find yourself putting all your eggs in one basket today. There are risks to be taken, but only at the right time.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Give yourself time to get used to new circumstances today before you try to pick up speed. Any premature action on your part will be risky.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Indecision can be quite hazardous today. Once you have your mind fixed on something, keep it there – or suffer the consequences.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Seek and ye shall find today – and it's likely that you'll have much of what you ant by day's end. Don't think you have it all, however!
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may feel that it is perfectly acceptable to do things your own way today, but though no one may complain, long-term dangers may arise.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Quality control is likely to be an issue before the day is out. You will have to put your foot down and insist that those around you follow the rules.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Someone will have reason to congratulate you before the day is out. Later, a friend will want to take time out with you to explore an unusual option.

UMass exorcises Providence

Helenan, Jalkanen lead victory charge

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, RI – Sometimes a little reminder of how good a team can be is enough to pull it out of a funk. The Massachusetts men's hockey team traveled to Schneider Arena on Friday and downed ninth ranked Providence College 3-1, its fifth straight triumph over the Friars.

Martin Miljko and R.J. Gates scored five minutes apart in the second period and Markus Helanen made 36 saves to lead the Maroon and White (4-1-0-2 overall, 4-3-0 Hockey East) to its first victory in eight games, despite being more than doubled in shots, 37-18. Mike Warner added an empty net goal for the Minutemen, while Jon DiSalavatore scored for PC.

"I thought we played a pretty good road game," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "We played with a little bit of intelligence and even though we took some penalties, so it was definitely a good effort in terms of our attitude going into the game and what we tried to accomplish."

Defense and penalty killing, combined with Helanen's spectacular play between the pipes, were the keys to the Minuteman victory. The penalty killing, which had struggled as of late, was duly impressive as UMass killed off all six of PC's man advantages.

"We talked about being a little more aggressive on the penalty kill," said sophomore defenseman Samuli Jalkanen. "[Schneider Arena] is a small rink, so it's easier to be aggressive than back at home."

Despite giving up 12 shots while shorthanded, the majority of these were harmless outside shots which Helanen had no trouble handling.

"Statistically, our penalty kill was atrocious, but I think the puck bounced a little bit more for us tonight than it had in previous games," said Cahoon.

The defense, although it gave up 37 shots, was solid for the most part, combating the majority of the Friars' attempts to penetrate the zone in front of Helanen.

"We've been working on our D-zone plays and Markus played really well tonight," said Jalkanen. "They had a lot of shots, but most didn't come from inside the Grade-A area. All six defensemen played well."

For Providence, (8-4-3, 5-3-1 HE) it was simply a game in which it could not get much of anything going offensively, and in the rare moments that it did, Helanen turned them away. His biggest saves of the night, including two point-blank attempts, came in the third period, when the Friars upped the pressure.

The first came at the 9:36 mark, just ten seconds after UMass winger Brad Nizwantowki got out of the box following a high sticking minor. After a shot from his right seemed to catch Helanen off guard, Providence senior captain Jay Leach tried to slide a pass to a wide-open Peter Fregoe on the other side. Fregoe took a shot and the crowd erupted with joy until it realized that Helanen had snuck his glove to the far side of the crease to smother the shot.

"Obviously, we stayed poised at the end when things got real hectic, and they took it to us a little bit," said Cahoon. "But we hung in there. From that standpoint, I thought it was a hard-earned and a nice win."

The scoring opened on the night when PC's Marc Suderman carried the puck behind the net and fed a pass to DiSalvatore in front. His initial shot was turned away, but as captain Jeff Turner crashed into Helanen, DiSalvatore simply flipped the puck into the shelf.

UMass got on the board 10:36 into the second frame. Sophomore Jimmy Callahan used his toughness to keep the puck in at the left point for the Maroon and White. He then brought the puck in deep and found Miljko in front. Reminiscent of the Friars' earlier tally, Miljko took several shots before lifting the puck above the shoulder of senior netminder Boyd Ballard.

"I thought [Callahan] made a great play on the goal that Miljko ended up getting, keeping the puck in the zone and getting to the loose puck," added Cahoon.

Just over five minutes later, Jalkanen took a pass from Warner and wheeled around the boards before feathering a pass directly in front to Gates, who simply placed the puck through Ballard's wide-open five hole for the game-winner.

"I saw Mike coming towards me, I jumped in and he dropped the puck off to me," said Jalkanen. "I went behind the net and saw Gates in front of the goal, so I passed it to him."

Much to the relief of the Minuteman faithful, UMass broke the late pressure in the third, as Jalkanen knocked away a centering pass, and Jeff Turner found Warner as he broke out of the zone, who flipped the rubber into the net with nine seconds remaining.

UMass is off until Thursday when it travels to Orono, Maine to face the Black Bears at 7 p.m.

Friars pay homage to Helanen, Minutemen

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, RI – Maybe a neck massage or a brace would help to ease the pain felt by Markus Helanen. Instead of using one of these various health remedies, however, the Massachusetts goalkeeper employed a 3-1 victory over the ninth ranked Providence Friars to placate the pressure felt from standing on his head for sixty minutes.

"Helanen was brilliant," said Head Coach Don Cahoon after Friday night's victory at Schneider Arena.

After a series of shaky starts that aided in an eight game winless streak for the Minutemen, Helanen donned cape and mask and returned to his former brilliance.

"Markus was his old self and that makes a big difference," said Cahoon of his goalie's outstanding performance between the pipes.

Helanen made 36 saves on the night, including a number of highlight reel stops that had the PC forwards talking to themselves as they skated back to the bench.

Helanen controlled the contest, forcing the Friars to play by his rules. The only goal he allowed was completely out of his control after he was knocked over by his own man and PC's Jon DiSalavatore shelved a third-time chance.

Following the initial Providence goal though, Helanen kept the game and its action on a tight leash.

The Finland native was especially stellar in the second period, when the Friars rained down 18 shots, but the best of the netminder's key saves and game saving heroics came in the final frame of action.

Going into the third period, the Minutemen were clinging to a one-goal lead while the Friars had over a minute left in a power play that carried over from the previous period. The crowd was fired up as PC had shown signs of a comeback leading into the third. Helanen however, quieted the Providence faithful by challenging the opposing shooters from the top of his crease and guiding all rebounds to the corners.

"I challenged them a little bit more, I came out a little farther," said the Maroon and White's goalkeeper after the game.

After muffling the home team's power play, he made two game saving saves. The first came before the midway point of the period when the goalie made a series of point blank stops and a rebound squirted to a PC forward who was staring at a yawning net. Helanen reacted quickly by lunging to his left with the massive catching glove, snaring the shot and saving the game.

"I don't know who got the shot, but he didn't get all of it. It was just one of those where you get lucky," said Helanen, forgetting to mention that he is good as well as lucky.

Every fan in attendance thought the Friars had tied up the game, as the crowd erupted and even the music signaling a goal started playing. Unfortunately for the home fans in attendance, they were unaware that to Helanen, the outcome of this game was a foregone conclusion.

No matter how many chances the Friars would get, no more pucks would cross the goal line.

Helanen was called upon again with less than nine minutes to go in the period. As UMass attempted to clear the zone, the puck deflected off a PC player and right to a streaking Adam Lee who deked left before firing a shot towards the top right corner. Helanen anticipated the play and stacked the pads, as the puck fell harmlessly to the lee.

Helanen earned himself the first star of the game, but the importance of his play goes much deeper than that. The Fin seemingly got the UMass penalty kill back on track by shutting down PC six times with the man advantage.

Providence ripped off 37 shots to a miniscule 18 for the Minutemen. Unfortunately for the Friars, there were few holes between the bricks and mortar of the maroon and white wall in net.

Minutewomen drop two home contests

Rutgers romps

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

With just over six minutes left in the first half, Kathy Coyner pulled up from a couple feet behind the three-point arc and drained that triple to put her Massachusetts women's basketball team up eight, 23-15 over the No. 9 Scarlet Knights of Rutgers University.

A little over seven minutes into the second frame, Siiri Liivandi made a cut into the paint, took the inbounds pass and converted on the easy lay-in to give the Minutewomen their twenty-fifth tally of the contest.

In the midst of these two Maroon and White baskets, the Scarlet Knights put together a decisive 28-0 scoring onslaught.

Liivandi's hoop brought the score to 43-25 and ended the Minutewomen's 12:42 drought. They would cut the Scarlet Knight advantage to 14 later in the stanza but that's as close as they would get, falling for the fourth time in as many games, 78-57.

The loss drops UMass to 3-5 on the season. With the victory, Rutgers now stands at 6-1 – its lone loss coming at the hands of No. 5 Georgia.

Rutgers' Tasha Pointer (7-for-9) led all scorers with 22 points on the afternoon. Tammy Sutton-Brown added 18 and Karlita Washington netted 14.

Coyner led UMass with 20 points. Caroline Nehls had 13 and Amber Sneed had 11.

UMass jumped out to an early 8-5 lead thanks in part to the high-low post play of Nehls and Jennifer Butler. At 16:12, Coyner fed the ball to Butler on the low post. From her high-post position, Nehls made a cut straight to the hoop as her defender went to help out on Butler. Butler quickly recognized the double team and found Nehls for the easy hoop. About two minutes later, Nehls found Butler in the same situation for the easy score.

"When the ball went into the post from the wing, they were doubling," Nehls said. "It made either one of us open a lot. Their whole defense shifted over and kind of forgot about the opposite. We always look for each other like that."

The lead was extended to eight on the aforementioned Coyner trey, but that would be the last basket the Minutewomen would see for a while. The next four possessions (mishandled pass, traveling violation, shot clock violation, three-second violation) would all result in UMass turnovers. The Maroon and White totaled 28 mishaps on the afternoon.

Rutgers did a good job of masking its defenses and press formations the entire game. It resulted in 15 Scarlet Knight steals.

"They zoned it up a little bit early and then went to man but when they went to their match-up [zone], and they did a good job disguising it," Head Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "It was actually man-for-man, we did a poor job of recognizing it. We had opportunities to get some things but we didn't execute. Then we just lost our focus."

Rutgers shot an outstanding 76.2 percent from the field in the second half – 61.9 percent for the game. UMass drained 40 percent of its field goal attempts.

The only advantage the Minutewomen had was on the boards, outrebounding the Scarlet Knights 37-20.

"Massachusetts, in my opinion – they will rise to the level of competition," Rutgers coach Vivian Stringer said. "They rose to Georgia and then you look at other scores and you're like 'what the heck?' They have a disease that all other teams have – the same thing my team has. There are few teams that don't have [it]. Those teams are (No. 1) Connecticut and (No.2) Tennessee. They don't see anybody else out there. They play for excellence. They have a level of expectation. That's how the great teams play."

U woeful in home loss to JMU

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

Could haves, would haves, and should haves don't matter. It didn't pull it out, and it could have won this one.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (3-4) took the William D. Mullins Center hardwood on Friday night against James Madison University (4-3), and it wasn't pretty. JMU won the game, 72-65, and although it wasn't a blowout, it was a constant case of catch-up as UMass trailed by an average of nine points during the second half.

UMass was out-rebounded, out-shot, out-hustled, and out-played in every major aspect of the game. In a contest that Head Coach Joanie O'Brien conceded she couldn't take anything positive away from, the game will be a memory that is hopefully forgotten quickly.

"I'm very disappointed," O'Brien said. "Every game for us will be a challenge, but we didn't play. We played soft; we played passive. We got some people out there that think scoring is their most important thing and that's why we're struggling."

O'Brien made it obvious that she was most upset about her team's play on the defensive half of the court; or perhaps, she was most upset about her team's lack of play on the defensive half of the court. James Madison scored 13 more fast break points than the Minutewomen, 14 more in the paint, and grabbed more total rebounds. The Dukes shot a deadly 52% from the field, including 3-5 from behind the arc.

"My biggest disappointment in the game was our defense," said O'Brien. "We were so passive on defense. On offense, we missed a lot of shots. We got a lot of good looks, but the ball didn't go in the hole. It basically came down to our defense and we didn't step up and play tonight and that was a big concern for me."

If UMass is to go anywhere this season, it will have to play strong 'D' and win the ever-important rebound battle, neither of which it did on Friday.

In the frontcourt, the Minutewomen were limited to only 17 points from its three major post players. Sophomore center Jennifer Butler was held to a mere 8 points on 2-14 shooting and her fellow colleagues Caroline Nehls and Siiri Liivandi combined for only 9 points.

As for the backcourt, senior point guard Kathy Coyner was as solid as ever. The co-captain brought 25 points home while nailing four of her seven shots from three-point land. But Coyner couldn't do it all herself, and she knew that. Enter Amber Sneed. The sophomore had her best game of the season, coming off the bench to score 15 points over 25 minutes.

"Amber was playing well and she was making some things happen," O'Brien said. "She was playing with emotion and she was really the only one playing with emotion. She was all over the place trying to get everybody fired up, and she did a great job."

But Sneed fouled out with 5:40 left in the game, and no one else was able to step and score. Freshman Paige Harris was held to only six points on six attempts. Both of Harris's baskets were treys, and it is evident that she needs more shooting attempts. But opposing teams are recognizing that Harris is dangerous, and are covering her appropriately. JMU ran a "triangle on two" zone defense, which took Harris out of the mix of things.

But in the end, UMass didn't shoot well in the second half (30.2%), didn't defend very well, and didn't fight throughout this game. The Dukes wanted this one more, and they got it.

Coyner said it best: "I think there are a lot of things that we have to go back and evaluate as a team. We need to look each other in the eye and know that we can trust one another and go out there and play. We have a lot of things to do."

Professor details "smart water"

Murphy outlines H_2O markets, rights, storage

SCOTT ELDRIDGE/COLLEGIAN

Professor James Murphy

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Center for Public Policy and Administration wrapped up its Colloquium Series yesterday with a lecture on 'smart' water markets by Resource economics professor Jim Murphy.

Murphy discussed his experiments with students and water professionals, attempting to set up a workable, efficient water market.

"I'm going to focus on the design of water market institutions rather than whether or not markets are good or bad," Murphy said.

Water markets are systems by which to trade water. Different markets systems have different rules, Murphy explained.

"Its like online auction houses. You've got Ebay, and their rules, and Amazon.com and their rules. EBay will close an auction at a certain time, but Amazon will close only if there hasn't been any new bids for a certain amount of time."

Particular attention was paid to California, which possess unique ecological and environmental problems.

Northern California has the rivers, and 80 percent of the precipitation, while southern California has 67 percent of the population.

"Its an interesting dialectic," Murphy said. "And 80 percent of the water is used for agriculture."

There is a growing demand for water due to population growth, and there are decreasing supplies. Even though it is often hard hit by droughts, California, until recently, discouraged water storage. California beneficial use laws required property owners to use the water, or lose the rights to use it.

"In California, you don't own the water, you own the right to use the water," Murphy added.

California has monitoring stations along every river and stream, to accurately count the amount of water in the state.

"Its really scary. Every drop of water is accounted for," Murphy said.

The 1991-2 Drought changed many things in California. The California Department of Water Resources set up Drought Water Banks.

"It wasn't really a market," explained Murphy. "They set the price, bought all available water, and then turned around and sold it at the same price."

The problem, Murphy says, is that the DWR doesn't want to give up control.

Murphy's experiments have been largely successful, mostly due to the available technology.

"Computers let us do things that weren't possible in the early '90s. They solve all the coordination problems," he said.

In Murphy's tests, the results consistently rate the markets at high efficiency.

"One of the things we found pretty quickly is that the markets converge pretty close to 90-100 percent," Murphy related. "Water storage is still a problem. We want people storing water."

School of Education expanding

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The University's staff is growing.

The School of Education has recently added seven new professors, and the Resource Economics department has added one.

Associate Professor Maurianne Adams is primarily concerned with social justice education. She specializes in social identity/cognitive development, multi-cultural learning styles and teaching strategies and multicultural adult development. She will be working with School of Education faculty on social justice education issues in the student development and pupil personnel services department.

Assistant Professor Linwood Vereen joins her in that department. Vereen is an expert in school counselor education, particularly group supervision counseling and multicultural counseling.

Also joining the department of student development and pupil personnel services as an Assistant Professor is Ximena Zuniga. Zuniga, who has a Ph. D. in education, will work with the faculty on social justice education.

The School of Education's department of teacher education and curriculum studies gained three professors.

Assistant Professor Lenore Carlisle will be working in the area of elementary education. She is an expert in authentic assessment, university/school partnerships, constructivist teacher education, and creative writing.

Margaret Gebhard has joined the School of Education as an Assistant Professor. Her work includes second language and literacy acquisition in public school contexts, professional development of second language teachers, school reform and language minority students.

Assistant Professor Clare Kilbane is an expert in educational technology. Kilbane received her Ph.D. in education from the University of Virginia in August 2000. Her work focuses on educational technology, teacher preparation and professional development of in-service teachers.

The School's department of educational policy, research and administration added Assistant Professor Alberto Arenas. Arenas will be working on policy/program evaluation and international education. He specializes in program and policy evaluation, international education, and ecological sustainability.

The Department of Resource Economics added Nathalie Lavoie to its ranks. Lavoie is an expert in Canadian wheat exports and its supply and demand ramifications in international trade. She will be an Assistant Professor.

Supreme Court enters presidency melee

By Chris Thompson
Collegian Staff

The nine Justices of the U.S. Supreme Court peppered lawyers representing Al Gore and George W. Bush with questions while they argued competing claims in the Florida election contest yesterday.

Gore attorney David Boies, who argued a successful contest of Florida's certified election result before the Florida Supreme Court last week, reasoned before the U.S. Supreme Court that a hand recount of the state's undercounted ballots was necessary to determine which candidate will be the next President.

Theodore B. Olson argued Bush's position, that the manual recount ordered by the Florida Supreme Court was unconstitutional. According to Olson, the Florida election law provisions are not subject to review by the state Supreme Court, and that state legislatures were empowered by the Constitution to determine how presidential electors are chosen.

Boies argued that the Florida High Court had the authority to review every state statute, including election law.

"State law allows judicial determination of any election to determine the rightful winner of an election," Boies said.

Olson insisted that the only votes that should be counted were those with the ballot chad cleanly punched through.

"The only legal votes are those where the voter made sure that the chad was completely punched and was not hanging off the ballot," Olson said.

In a 5-4 decision, the High Court ordered an immediate stay of county by county recounts in Florida on Saturday, less than 24 hours after the Florida Supreme Court ordered a manual counting of the state's undervotes – ballots that were not counted by machine.

In a concurring opinion Justice Antonin Scalia claimed that the Florida Supreme Court ordered a count of illegal votes and that that process would "cast a cloud" on the election's legitimacy.

"One of the principal issues in the appeal we have accepted is precisely whether the votes that have been ordered to be counted are, under a reasonable interpretation of Florida law, 'legally cast votes,'" Justice Scalia said in the opinion.

The Justices concentrated on the Bush claim that varying standards of what constitutes a vote in Florida counties violated Bush's "equal protection" under the law, as provided by the 14th amendment to the Constitution.

At one point during the Court proceedings Justice Sandra Day O'Connor rebuked the Florida Supreme Court for its handling of last week's Supreme Court order to review its extension of the state's election certification deadline.

"It just seemed to kind of bypass us and assume that all those changes and deadlines were just fine and they could go ahead and adhere to them," Justice O'Connor said, "and I found that troublesome."

Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer hinted at a possible compromise decision, sending the case back to Florida and defining what qualifies as a vote. However, the five Justice conservative block on the Court, Rehnquist, Scalia, Thomas, Kennedy and O'Connor, who voted to stay the recounts, seemed unlikely to change their vote as a result of yesterday's deliberations.

Justice Anthony Kennedy questioned Boies on whether or not the standard for counting votes in Florida was uniform.

Yes, Boies answered, "the standard is whether or not the intent of the voter is reflected by the ballot."

"That's very general," Justice Kennedy said. "In this case what we are concerned with is an intent that focuses on this little piece of paper called a ballot, could that vary from county to county?"

Boies replied, "I think it can vary from individual to individual." But added that machines inherently used different standards when counting votes.

More than four weeks after the Presidential election, its result may rest with the Supreme Court.

"If no votes are counted, then I think that's the end of the road," Boies said.

The decision by the Florida court to include manual recounts in the state total trimmed Bush's razor thin lead in the state from 537 to 193 votes, after the results of a recount in Palm Beach County and a partial recount in Dade County were included in the total.

The cool sounds of area's own freshmaker

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

The Pioneer Valley offers one of the most musically aware and enthusiastic populations in New England. The towns of Amherst and Northampton are considerably especially diverse centers of art and culture, enjoying a strong folk tradition and a general open-mindedness about music. This culture, as does any such liberal forums for art, has attracted a formidable cast of street musicians; a Friday night spent walking around downtown Northampton lets one enjoy home-brewed accordion, guitar and percussion music, just to name the more common acts.

Fair Amherst boasts its own regular street musician, and anyone who's spent any time walking around downtown has certainly seen him, probably in front of Antonio's, entertaining passersby with improvised ditties and odd little observations. His name is Mentos, and he plays the steel drum.

Mentos moved to the U.S. from the Caribbean in 1979, and has played the steel drum from the past 25 years (his son has joined the act more recently). He also plays guitar, and takes on drum kit duties when playing with his band, Mentos and the Horizon; their first album, Sunshine People, will be released soon.

When asked about the perplexing quips he tosses out at pedestrians, he broke into a warm smile and explained, "If it's hot, I'll say 'I wish I was a fish.'"

It is his band, however, that most interests Mentos, and not the time he spends playing the steel drum for local pedestrians.

"I only play [on the street] when my band's isn't working," he said, adding, "It's hard for me to get gigs around here, so I travel to the Cape in the winter."

This inability to market himself and play at some of the many excellent musical venues in the area, despite the amount of time he has devoted to performing in the area and his undeniable street recognition, is something that continues to bother the sincere, soft-speaking and quietly witty musician.

Mentos had a lot to say about his difficulty in finding an audience in the Valley for his music, observing, "I don't think they give Reggae music enough attention in the Pioneer Valley, especially people in authority."

Despite multiple requests to be allowed to participate, Mentos said that he's never been invited to the Taste of Northampton festival. "They give me the run around all the time," he said, clearly frustrated at what he perceived to be his intentional exclusion from the local music scene. "Sometime I feel like I'm down, but not by choice."

"I'd like them to know that I'm part of the community, deep in the community," he said, adding, "All the kids love Reggae music. It don't bite no one."

Whether or not he is embraced by local event planners and given more opportunities to play for wider audiences, however, Mentos will continue to perform on the streets of the Pioneer Valley.

"I'm like a squirrel. I work in the summer, gather up my nuts," he said.

Mentos isn't completely without upcoming dates, however; besides his open-ended schedule in front of Antonio's, he will be performing at Northampton's First Night celebration this year. Mentos and the Horizon will be performing at the People's Pint in Greenfield on January 6. He offered as a shoutout to his fans, "Come and see me."

Stress tips can ease finals week

By Pam Dewey
The Daily Iowan (U. Iowa)

(U-WIRE) IOWA CITY, Iowa – With the arrival of finals week comes a flurry of papers, tests and last-minute cramming sessions, which leaves many University of Iowa students worn-out and feeling stressed.

Kathleen Stales, an assistant director of the University Counseling Service, said one of the most important things to remember during finals week is self-care.

She emphasized the importance of eating properly, getting enough sleep and exercising.

By eating properly, students are able to maintain a stable blood-sugar level, which helps with brain function, Stales said. Exercising can also help reduce anxiety by as much as 50 percent, she added.

UI graduate student Kirsten Bland agreed that sleep is important during finals week.

"You can only study so much. I would rather go to bed early than cram for hours and hours," she said.

It is vital to alternate material such as science and math with humanities and literature while studying, Stales said.

This way, she said, mental energies are used differently.

Not only can stress be harmful for students mentally, but according to Iowa Health Educator Denise Ramsey, there are many ways a person can be affected physically by stress.

Problems include headaches, stomachaches, digestive problems, insomnia, backaches and eye twitches, Ramsey said.

Students may also experience anxiety because they feel stressed, she said. According to the Anxiety/Panic Attack Resource Web site, anxiety can cause such symptoms as a pounding heart, tightness of the chest, dry mouth and hyperventilation.

However, Ramsey said, "I think it depends so much on the individual."

It is also important for students to be well prepared, which helps to prevent stress, Pat Folsom, the interim director of the UI Academic Advising Center, often suggests that students "approach a class as if you are going to teach it.

"If you can explain it to someone, then you know you've got it," Folsom said.

Stales also suggested that students record themselves reciting the information they needed to know as another effective way to study.

"There is something about hearing the sound of your own voice on a tape recorder that assists memory," she said.

UI junior Fabiana De Abreu knows all too well how much work finals can require of students. De Abreu had five papers due last week, and she said she is "getting crazy."

As a result, De Abreu said, she practically lived at the library last week, staying from about 7:30 a.m. to 10:30 p.m. everyday. De Abreu, who took a stress-management class, said the skills she learned help her cope when she begins to feel overwhelmed.

Folsom also stressed that study breaks are important, saying that students should do "something that takes you outside of the academic realm for a while."

Some students with whom Folsom has talked enjoy doing such things as taking a walk, going out for coffee or even baking cookies as a study break.

Police issue $10,000 fine to D.C. college bar in ID crackdown

By Ashley M. Heher & Sarah Lechner
The GW Hatchet (George Washington U.)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – Metropolitan Police Department officials say this month they will launch a full-scale initiative targeting the District's underage drinkers and the bars that routinely serve them.

Following the February death of Georgetown University student David Schick during an alcohol-related fight, MPD Chief Charles Ramsey, with the aid of university administrators, began an initiative called D.C. CARES to battle underage drinking in the District.

The Capital Alcohol Reduction Effort focuses on local legislation and aims to create a citywide campus culture that does not promote alcohol abuse, GW Dean of Students Linda Donnelli said.

"We do have concerns with students getting arrested," Donnelli said. Since the beginning of the school year, MPD has arrested numerous students from GW and other universities for underage possession of alcohol and use of false identification, said MPD Lt. Pat Burke, who is spearheading the crackdown.

"The bottom line, this year is to make people think they're going to take a chance and get as many people as twel can," Burke said.

Beginning in about two weeks, plain-clothed MPD officers will begin to pose as bouncers in popular bars around D.C. campuses.

The officers will use "intelli-check" scanners – portable devices similar to credit card machines that scan the magnetic strip found on most state driver's licenses – to determine validity of IDs.

Local bartenders and club managers said they have seen a larger presence of law enforcement officers in the past year, including D.C.'s Alcohol Beverage Control board.

"The ABC has spent more time at the clubs than they ever have before," said A.J. Arora, the manager of Odds bar and club. "Before you might see them every three of four months, now you see them once or twice a month."

Last week the District fined Odds, at 1160 20th St., $10,000 and suspended its liquor license for 15 days after ABC officers found underage patrons drinking inside.

"It's a lot of money," Arora said. "It's going to hurt us a lot." Arora said patrons are always asked to present ID at the door.

"If their ID says they're 21, how can we determine if they're not?" he said. "If the ID says they're 21, what can we legally do? If we don't let them in, places like Tequila (Grill) or Rumors will."

In June the D.C. City Council passed the Underage Drinking Emergency Act of 2000, which added a heftier penalty for using fake IDs.

Now, anyone caught using a fake ID will be arrested on the spot and fined $300. The offense also comes with up to 90 days of jail time. "If it is fake, we'll lock the person up for false representation," Burke said. "People need to think about it. They're taking their chances. It's a criminal charge. They're going to wind up in a jail cell and that's not a pretty thing."

Police know which establishments to target for underage drinking based on tips from area universities.

GW administrators keep a running tally of the number of palmcards distributed on campus by bars and clubs promoting their drink specials and college nights. They forward the statistics – along with information they compile during alcohol-related disciplinary hearings – to MPD and the ABC. "We'll use (that information) to hit the hardcore places," Burke said. Through an agreement with MPD, arrest documents relating to GW students are forwarded to the University Police Department. UPD may then press charges against the student, in addition to District charges.

The files are also sent from UPD to GW's Student Judicial Services for prosecution.

This semester, SJS has charged 27 people for alcohol-related incidents, said David Pine, manager of SJS. Pine said he was not sure how many GW students face charges in the District.

AIDS Wall created in Zimbabwe

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

The Harare National Gallery Sculpture Garden in Zimbabwe recently presented a new public arts project entitled The AIDS Wall, Healing the Community.

The project presents the impact of the AIDS virus as seen through the eyes of artists from the Ros Byrne Pottery Factory in nearby Ruwa.

Nineteen artists from the factory contributed to the sculpture. It is made up of a Z-shaped wall, both sides of which are embedded with ceramic tiles painted by the Ruwa artists.

The tiles illustrate the artist's impressions of how AIDS has affected the urban rural populations of the nation.

A tile-imbedded bench near the Z-wall has also been constructed. These tiles present AIDS-related poetry and drawings created by children from the Emerald Hill Children's Home, Streets Ahead and Shungu Dze'Vana Trust organizations.

The sculpture's dedication ceremony will be held on Wednesday at 4 p.m. in the National Gallery Sculpture Garden.

Curator of the National Sculpture Gallery, Pip Curling, hailed the AIDS Wall project as one to help "break the silence" surrounding the AIDS pandemic in Zimbabwe. She hopes to provide the community with a focused approach dealing with loss resulting from the disease and the prevention of the spread of the virus.

"The descriptive style of the Ruwa artists accurately describes the complexities of the situation with local colour and even a bit of humour," Curling said. "A brief text in English, Shona and Ndebele accompanies each panel. We think this public art will contribute to recognition of the toll of Aids, to the memory of loved ones lost, and hopefully to the awareness and healing that are needed to move toward control of this epidemic."

The Ros Byrne Pottery Factory has an international standard and exports all over the world. Appeals court dismisses charges against Pinochet; case taken to Supreme Court

A lucky Pinochet relaxing in Chile

The Chilean Appeals Court dismissed charges of kidnaping and homicide against former dictator General Augusto Pinochet, in a case that is already being appealed to the Supreme Court in Chile.

The order to remove Pinochet from house arrest came yesterday after the court voted in a 3-0 unanimous decision in the 5th Chamber in the Santiago Court of Appeals panel.

Defense attorneys for Pinochet claim that Judge Juan Guzman acted illegally by indicting the former dictator before questioning him, and also for not allowing him to undergo both neurological and mental tests in order to prove that he is fit to stand trial.

The court agreed with this assessment, turning down the plaintiff's argument that the two written questionnaires filled out by Pinochet while he was under house arrest in London should be considered the mandatory pre-indictment questioning.

"The court has only ruled that the indictment of Pinochet was improper because he was not questioned by a judge before it was issued," Carmen Hertz an anti-Pinochet lawyer said. "But the ruling does not involve the essence of the case against him."

Hertz, also the widow of a dissident killed during the rein of Pinochet called the judgment a "mere formality." Her husband, journalist Carlos Berger, was part of the "Caravan of Death" his body has never been found.

"We will now go to the Supreme Court," she asserted.

Supporters of the former dictator were pleased by the decision, with a small band of supporters running out of the courthouse cheering and carrying the flag of Chile.

"In a way, the big injustice against Gen. Augusto Pinochet has been corrected," said retired Col. Alberto Labbe, one of Pinochet's closest associates. "A light of hope for reconciliation among Chileans has emerged."

Opponents of Pinochet responded just as strongly citing this incident as a miscarriage of justice.

"This shows that Pinochet continues to hold the power of a dictator and is favored by the courts," said Viviana Diaz, president of an organization of relatives of dissidents who disappeared after being arrested by Pinochet's security services said to The New York Times. "Let's just hope that justice will be made some day," Diaz added.

Pinochet was accused of crimes against humanity for his involvement in the 1973 military operation called "Caravan of Death." He was implicated in a situation that involved the execution of political prisoners. Pinochet is charged with the homicide of 35 prisoners, and the kidnapping of 18 whose bodies still remain missing.

The government refused to comment on the rulings with President Ricardo Lagos commenting before the ruling that he would ensure that the decision was respected. Additional rulings from the Supreme Court could come in as early as Tuesday.

Estrada remains in hot water

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The third day of impeachment proceedings against Philippinesian President Joseph Estrada opened with a flourish featuring testimony from the government and that discovered illegal gambling payoffs involving Estrada.

Emma Lim, aid to providential Governor Luis Singson, took the stand yesterday and testified regarding the five million pesos ($100,000) in illegal gambling payoffs garnered from "jueteng" an illegal numbers game. She testified to taking the pesos to Estrada's personal secretary at the Presidential Palace in March of 1999.

"The money was in a black bag that was like an attache case, I said I was going to see Malou, the secretary of the president. I was let in. They were not strict ... I left the bag with Malou," Lim said. "After I left the bag, I walked away and saw President Estrada standing nearby."

This was Lim's second day of testimony, on Friday she testified to receiving payments of one million pesos ($20,000) on three occasions from Estrada's son Jinggoy Estrada, the mayor of San Juan, a small town in Manila.

Jinggoy Estrada was called to testify later in the trial after being labeled as the regional collector of payoffs from jueteng.

Estrada, who has served as president of the Philippines for two years, came under fire in October when he was accused of accepting bribes of more than 400 million pesos ($8 million) from jueteng and an additional 130 million ($2.3 million) in taxes that was meant to be used as aid to help local tobacco farmers. He is now being tried on charges of betrayal of public trust, graft and violation of the constitution, all of the charges to which he claims innocence. In order for him to be removed from office a two-thirds majority of the 22 members of Senate is required to remove Estrada from office. The Senate is asking that Estrada step down and resign from his position to save the country from economic troubles.

Controversy has surrounded these proceedings from the very beginning, with yesterday being no exception with arguments surrounding the job that congressmen from the country acting as prosecutors have been doing with their job. The nation's largest group of lawyers Integrated Bar of the Philippines, called for a change in the prosecution team due to a poor job in their role in the proceedings.

The group offered its help and suggested that practicing criminal lawyers try the case rather than Congressmen.

"They are lawmakers and are no longer practicing lawyers," IBP president Arthur Lim said. "They are rusty."

Although Congressman Sergio Apostol, a prosecutor said that they would accept any tips presented to them about the case, that they already have outside help from private lawyers that are working on the case with nearly 25 attorneys on every faucet of it.

Oil-for-food extended in Iraq

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

After a month of suspended exports, Iraq accepted an extension on its oil-for-food deal that shares with the United Nations and will resume oil exportation.

In an effort to gain extra cash, officials in Baghdad insisted on charging a surcharge on all barrels of oil. The surcharge would be illegal under UN sanctions because it would allow Iraq to retain profits from their exports.

The oil-for-food program was set up in 1990 after Iraq invaded Kuwait. It was established to help citizens in the war-torn country. Under the program, Iraq is only allowed to export a certain number of barrels of oil per year and all the money from the sales is supposed to go to humanitarian aid, such as food and health care.

However the UN does understand that the country does need money to run itself and therefore approved the plan to use $1 billion to pay for maintenance of its oil refining facilities. They have not decided whether or not they will deposit the money directly into an Iraqi bank as Iraq wants.

The UN does not, however, agree that Iraq should pocket any extra money from its oil exports.

Under the current plan, all buyers of Iraqi oil make payments directly into a UN account.

What the Iraqi government demands now is that all buyers pay an extra 40 cents a barrel and pas it directly into an Iraqi bank, thus enabling the government to regain some control over its own revenues. Business partners with oil-for-food contracts are already feeling increasing pressure to pay Iraq ten percent directly, regardless of the UN rules. It has been reported that Iraq has made agreements with India to excuse the surcharge under their new oil-for-wheat barter, but so far nothing has been made official.

Iraq has grown more and more disdainful of the oil-for-food plan. Originally the program was supposed to only last six months. Ten years later, the Iraqi government is steadily pushing for the embargo to be lifted and for control over its oil business.

Oil exportation has been stalled for the past 11 days as the Iraq state oil marketing organization, SOMO, and the UN have been butting heads over the issue.

The Iraqi Foreign Minister Saeed al-Sahaf accepted the extension of oil-for-food in a letter that was published by the state news agency. The letter also expressed Iraq's growing criticism of the program. It accused the United States and Britain of using the oil-for-food program as a substitute for lifting sanctions.

Though the country is unhappy, it agreed to accept the extension as a sign of good faith and behavior. Sahaf stated that he wanted to show that the country did not have negative intentions.

There have been reports among oil traders, however, that Baghdad may enforce a boycott of deliveries to the US.

Meanwhile, oil prices have been steadily declining, despite the absence of oil production by Iraq.

Romanian votes in; Iliescu wins majority

By Jason Spears
Collegian Staff

A former Communist and former president has defeated his nationalist rival in the Romanian presidential election.

Ion Iliescu has 67 percent of the vote after 80 percent of the official vote had been counted. The large percentage gave Iliescu a clear victory over his rival Corneliu Vadim Tudor of the Greater Romania Party.

Iliescu's victory came in the second around of ballots after the first round failed to give anyone an out right victory.

Tudor nationalist views had frightened the Hungarian, Jewish and Gypsy communities in Romania.

Iliescu says the victory was a positive step for Romania.

"It is a victory of the maturity and responsibility of the Romanian people," said Iliescu according to the BBC.

Western governments were also alarmed of the former "court poet" to communist dictator Nicolae Ceausescu.

However, Iliescu's past with the communist party is not clean either. He participated in the punishment of students who supported the 1956 Hungarian Uprising as the senior official of the Union of Communist Youth. In 1969 he was a member of the Central Committee and of the Political Committee, which was party's inner ruling circle.

Iliescu says he parted ways with Ceausescu and was demoted to regional party jobs. In recent statements he has tried to distance himself from the communist government.

"I have always been a democrat who had nothing to do with the dull-witted actions of Communism," said Iliescu according to the BBC.

Iliescu said his election was a vote for joining the European Union and rejection of nationalism.

"The vote was a categorical rejection of extremism, xenophobia and totalitarian temptations," said Iliescu.

Iliescu's Party of Social Democracy won the largest number of seats in the nation's parliament in the elections two weeks ago. The party has already begun to form their government.

The Greater Romania Party won 25 percent.

In Romania the government and parliament have the real power and the president serves as a "ceremonial figure." However, he is highly visible at both home and abroad.

Iliescu and the new government have the difficult task of meeting voter expectations of ending the economic crisis. They also have to meet the demands of the European Union, International Monetary Fund and World Bank.

Iliescu was the first post communist president. When Ceausescu was overthrow and later executed in 1989, Iliescu rose to power through the Nation Salvation Front, a group of people from the former Communist government. He served as the interim president until he won the first elections in 1990.

His first term in office was scared by his endorsement of transporting miners into the Romania's capital, Bucharest, to brutally put down protest by students and opposition group.

Despite this use of violence, he was re-elected in 1992 and ran a government of the National Salvation Front, renamed the Party of Social Democracy, and national extremists.

His presidency was known for corruption and failure to institute economic reforms.

In 1996, a new centralist coalition government was elected, but also failed to improve the economic situation of the country.

In the recent election, Iliescu campaigned to the impoverished and attract votes from some centralist.

The pro-Western parties and many of nation's newspapers endorsed Iliescu. However, many people viewed the choice between the two candidates as choose between two lesser evils.

According to the BBC, a newspaper editor described the second ballot as "a choice between AIDS and cancer."

New elections: a good first step

While the Collegian does not agree with last week's monumental Student Government Association decision to declare its autumn election unconstitutional, rumors of a concerted legal response by the decision's opposition trouble us.

There is no denying that last week's decision was fraught with error. The judiciary was forced to make a horrific decision because members of the SGA Administration felt the need to press very piddling issues. Those Administration members were not concerned with the well being of the student body and the fact that they would work against an elected Senate is suspect. But that decision has been made, and while those members of the SGA Administration need to seriously consider the action they have chosen to take, one that will certainly end up hurting students far more seriously than it ever helps them, those who will suffer most immediately, the fired Senators, cannot consider taking significant legal action.

Right now, Senators who were elected and cried foul when they lost their jobs because they could no longer work for the good of the student body. The fact that they would then propose to sue the University or the Student Government Association totally undercuts their claim that they have the best interests of students in mind. Clearly, they don't, and if they reduce themselves to the sort of petty politicking practiced by their opposition, they then lose the ability to claim the high ground against that same opposition.

Our reporters have had a difficult time getting access to, or at least on the record information about, proposed lawsuits. Again, because this case has been surrounded by so many half-truths, students who propose to grind the entire SGA to a halt while not even clarifying why they plan to do so are only hurting themselves and their tenuous position.

This political bickering has got to stop. It is not beneficial to the students. Unfortunately, as always, the most forgotten group on this campus in this whole student political fiasco has been that very group. For elected officials to completely lose sight of their responsibilities to those that elected them isn't just troubling, it is embarrassing.

A Student Government Association is supposed to be a good thing, a representative body that does progressive work for the good of the students. It is supposed to be a helpful organization that can take the will of the students that care to higher people in higher places, but now? Now our SGA is flailing in deep water and doesn't have the proactive flexibles it needs. Because they have forgotten their responsibilities, students will suffer.

And it will be Registered Student Organizations that go on without budgets and a student body that goes on without representation that will truly suffer. Students who claim to act on the best behalf of other students should back that claim up; The Daily Collegian truly hopes to see an end to this petty and unproductive bickering. If we must wait through new elections, let us wait and hope that the next time around, the SGA will remember its true responsibility: the students that elected it.

A visit from St. Whitey

BRIAN LOHNES

We all have heard jokes about the gangster James "Whitey" Bulger, and how he may or may not be living on campus. For my sake I hope he's not. You see, Whitey is a pretty mean guy - mean enough that he has been on the FBI's Most Wanted list for quite a while now. In any event, I give to you a special UMass version of "Twas the Night before Christmas," or "A Visit from St. Nick." Here in all its glory is, "A Visit From St. Whitey." Hopefully this won't be the last thing I ever publish.

A Visit From St. Whitey

'Twas the night before Christmas Break when all through the dorm
Not a student was stirring, all the beer had gone warm
Their bags were placed by the door with care
In hopes that their parents would soon be there

The students were nestled all snug in their Beds
While visions of home-cooked meals danced in their heads
And Mrs. Scott in her 'Kerchief and the Chancellor in his Cap
Had just settled down for a long winter's nap.

When out on the Northeast quad there arose such a clatter
They sprang from their beds to see what was the matter
Away to the window, half drunken they stumbled
"What the hell was that?" many grumbled.

The moon on the breast of the new-fallen snow
Gave shimmering light onto the empty cans and bottles below
When what to their blurry eyes should appear?
But a miniature Cadillac and eight tiny men loaded with gear.

With a little old driver so quick and lively
I knew in a moment it must be St. Whitey
More rapid than eagles, his coursers they came
And he whistled, and shouted, and called them profane names

"Now Kelley! Now Smitty! Now Tony and Vinny!
On Butchy on Flemmi on O'Rourke and Nickey
To the top of the porch to the top of the wall
Now dash away, dash away, dash away all!"

As the flyers that before the wild hurricane fly
When they meet with an obstacle mount to the sky
So up to the housetop the coursers they flew
With the sleigh full of convicts and St. Whitey too

And then in a twinkling they head on the roof
The coughing and wheezing of some stoned goof
As they kicked their desks and screamed out aloud
Down the stairs St. Whitey came with a bound

He was dressed all in black, from his head to his feet
As his clothes were all tarnished from hiding under the Cadillac in the street
A bundle of cash he had flung on his back
And he looked like a criminal just opening his pack

His eyes—how they shifted his dark glasses so scary
His cheeks were like roses his nose like a cherry
His droll little mouth was drawn down in a scowl
And those kids could tell his mood was foul

The stump of a pipe he had held in his teeth
And the smoke it encircled his head like a wreath
He took a big breath and he called one of his men, "Hey Kelley!"
He shook when Whitey yelled at him like a bowl full of jelly

He was no slouch or a chump, a right mean old elf
And they laughed when they saw him, in spite of themselves
A wink of an eye and a twist of his head
Gave them to know they may soon be dead

He spoke not a word but went straight to his work
He stole all their bags and turned with a jerk
And laying his finger aside his gun holster
And given a nod to Kelley, up the chimney he was given a bolster

He sprang to his Caddy, to his thugs gave a whistle
And away they all flew, about as smooth as a SCUD missile
But I heard his exclaim, ere he drove out of sight
Happy Christmas to all and to all a good night!

Merry Christmas, UMass, and I hope you will see me again next semester. I have already given a bunch of my friends fliers with my picture on it to post on campus if I do happen to disappear for writing this.

Snapshot of the bar scene

KELLI O'HARA

Last weekend, I went out with my girlfriends to the Amherst bars for another typical weekend at school were the same thing always happens .. hook-ups, drunken conversations and bar fights. Yet, do any of you realize that the people who get drunk, hook-up, or get into the bar fight are usually the same people as the weekend before, well...aren't they?

For example, my friend Julie repeats the same pattern every weekend before we go out, she says she's not going to hook-up, and gives us all some BS story .. but when we get into the bar it's a whole new ballgame. The first guy to give her any sort of attention she goes home with, and its not just because she has this kind of entity where she'll rationalize it like if the guy walks her home, its ok to hook-up with him. I can't really figure it out; it's like she needs the hook-up for attention or to fill some void within herself. Afterwards, she says she wishes she didn't hook-up with the guy and feels really crappy about it. She cries or rather is miserable the next day, and as she waits by the phone she has to come to the sad realization that he isn't going to call.

Unfortunately, Jules hasn't come to the understanding that when you have behavior like this you get a reputation. And she has to come to the terms with the factor that she is kind of getting a rep, and sadly, people are beginning to call her a bar slut. However, I don't think that what Julie does is all that bad though.

See, there are a few different types of personalities when you go out to the bars or the parties on weekends. There are the people that go out, get drunk and have a great time; whether they hook-up or not its not a big deal to them cause they're just having fun. There are the guys that go out to prove their manhood by fighting or trying to pick up the most girls (a.k.a. tuff guys, in other words: my ex-boyfriend), there are the alcoholics (me), the groupies (the ones that only hook-up with football or basketball players, and forget the fact that they are being used), the hoochies (Southwest style), occasionally the nice people and then the girls (and guys) too), like my friend Jules. Yet, I don't understand how every freaking weekend it's the same thing. She has the hope that by hooking-up she's going to get into a relationship. And it's the same thing with frat girls. They hook-up with all the guys in the frat in a vain attempt to reassure some insecurity, or to belong. But only stab themselves in the foot by getting laughed at and labeled.

I feel bad for them and people like Julie, and believe me I am sure we all have done the same at one time or another, but the difference is learning your lesson. I just feel bad because she gets so hurt and doesn't understand why. In a way she is the deceiver and the deceived, she deceives herself into thinking that if she hooks-up with this guy he'll call her and want to get into a relationship with her. She also is the deceiver by playing into the affections of another, drink after drink in order to fill the void of getting no attention. She wants respect from others and wants, or rather needs self-esteem. But, what we all don't realize is that people like Jules have to stop lying to themselves, and learn to say no. On weekends she gets her confidence from her kicks, but Sunday mornings and the rest of the week she's lost because that attention is no longer there.

The saddest part of the whole thing is that she doesn't really enjoy the hook-up either; she thinks that by making another happy she'll make herself happy as well but she doesn't. We all know a Julie, and have given them our advice or told them to learn from their screw-ups but they don't and won't. It's just some weird pattern that I don't get and hope that only someday Julie will get enough respect (somehow) for herself and learn to say no and like herself better for doing so. Being crazy and wild is great, but not to the point where it starts to really hurt you as a person, and you realize the only thing that is funny is that the joke is on you.

Guarding the door

DANA OPPEDISANO

I am not proud to say this, but I was recently used to make an example. That's right – for the first time since my mother washed my mouth out with soap for using "the S word," I was taught my lesson. Sadly though, I think this lesson is actually going to stick, whereas anyone who knows me now will testify that I use "the S word" on an average of about 78 times per day. For example: "Damn, this DC food tastes like sh*t," "This class is hard as sh*t," and "My God, our room stinks like sh*t, dude!" I think you get the idea.

Okay, let me start this little story from the beginning. On the night of October 7th at 11:45 p.m., I walked out of an alarmed door in my building. Now, anyone who has ever done this realizes that this particular action will then proceed to release the loudest, most annoying sound on God's green earth for the next five minutes. I knew it was wrong then, as I do now, but I'll tend to disregard that squealing noise in exchange for not freezing my balls off by walking all the way around the building. Besides, and I mean no disrespect to my boy Mike, the RA who lives about 15 feet away from the door, but his little "Stop! You will get written up!" sign didn't exactly paralyze me with fear.

No more than twenty seconds after walking through that door, I see this dark figure hauling ass through the fog and straight at me. I think to myself, "damn, that chick is really moving." Turns out this "chick" is the ARD of my building, and I swear she was pullin' some "Platoon" sh*t with the leaves and the branches on a camouflaged suit, because she literally popped out of nowhere. Plus, I'm wondering why she's running like she's headed for the Ladies Room after a hearty DC brunch. Gotta love those Worcester Breakfast Sandwiches.

Well, she finally catches up to me and the first thing she does is tell me that I've just exited an alarmed door. No kidding, and here I thought that god-awful noise and the sudden deafness in my ears was biological. She writes me up, and I go about my business. Whatever. I've been written up before, and odds are that I'll be written up again. I've been written up for much worse – hell, I've even been in the girl's bathroom across the hall. Yeah I know, I'm a modern day Jimmy Dean, baby. Rebel without a cause. That's me, right?

Anyway, a couple of weeks go by before I get that little white letter, suspiciously missing its postmark. I read through it, and I decide to schedule a judicial conference with the new RD, figuring I'll make a good impression. As always, I completely lose the nerve to walk in there, tip over a chair and yell, "I dare you to write me up, bitch!" So instead I just kind of do what I always do when I have to pretend I'm listening: wrinkle my eyebrows a little, nod my head every so often, and insert phrases like "uh-huh." "oh absolutely," and "I totally agree" at random points throughout (don't worry Jenn, I never do this with you). Then Matt hits me with something I really cannot ignore.

It turns out that due to the constant problems with people exiting alarmed doors, the building has adopted a revolutionary new policy regarding its punishment, kind of an "eye for an eye" type program. He uses the following example: suppose I was reprimanded for tearing down a bulletin board, my punishment would then be to help the RA design and put up a new one. I immediately see where he's going with this.

"So Dana," he says. "You'll have to sit in front of the very door you exited for two hours on a weeknight before the end of the semester." I gotta ask myself, is this piece of work serious? What possible good is that gonna do? I know if I really wanted to exit an alarmed door, a little geek like me sure as hell wouldn't stop it. Besides, what the hell am I supposed to do in front of a door for two hours anyway?

"You could write one of your articles for the paper while you're down there," he suggests. I give him the same reaction I give everyone who is actually aware that I have this little biweekly forum here: 1) shock that he actually reads my garbage, and 2) disbelief that he can actually recognize and decipher the difference between the "Real Me" and the "Head-then-Me" which appears next to my columns. In the latter, I look like a drunken troll.

Anyway, a couple of weeks go by, and here I am, sitting alone with my ass cheeks numb from the uncomfortable chair/desk thing they were so nice to offer me. Boy, how right that RD was. Here I am, writing this puppy with about one hour left before I get parole. I don't even know if this friggin' alarm is on. Shouldn't it be beeping or something? Regardless, I sit, like a drunk-on-power rent-a-cop outside a Taco Bell.

To this point, I have been asked to fill out a survey regarding what should be done about these pesky alarm doors. In one section, I was asked to rate from best to worst a list of six suggestions. FYI – my pick for worst idea was installing a security camera to make sure no one went out this way. Yeah, that would be about as effective as the mystery video camera at the pyramids in Southwest, Iesus, that thing has really helped us cut back on that damn riot epidemic, hasn't it?

By the way, at this point, I have only had to tell one person to turn around. Some tall, scrawny kid who said "no problem" and turned right back the way he came. What's up with that? I thought this job was going to be tough. Hopefully I'll get in a brawl later with some hardass punks, and I can drag their sorry, bloody asses down to the cluster office and say, "You tell everyone that this is what happens if you try to walk out Dana's door! You tell 'em, tell 'em all!!!"

Oh well, you want to know something? I thought this was the dumbest thing I had ever heard of when I found out about it. Oh, don't get me wrong – I still think its downright moronic, but I will tell you right now – I will never, ever, walk out that alarmed door again. Just like Mom and that bar of Irish Spring so many years ago, I think this really did teach me a lesson. Although, like I said earlier, if this lesson turns out the same way the swearing one did...I may very well come back to my old building next year just to set off that damn alarm.

The editor's goodbye

It is with some sadness that I write this editor's letter today. You see, although most people do not realize this, this is the last GLBT Affairs page that will ever appear in the Collegian. This newspaper's diversity pages, many of which (like the Women's Affairs page) were eliminated last semester, are being completely dropped from the Collegian starting next semester.

I see the elimination of the GLBT Affairs page, as well as the elimination of the other diversity pages, with mixed emotions. On the one hand, I am glad that the Collegian's staff seems committed to integrating diversity into the regular content of the paper. I am very glad that I have seen numerous diversity-related articles in the News section of the Collegian this semester. I think the ultimate goal of many people, such as myself, who work to promote diversity and multiculturalism in our society is to have a true "salad bowl" society, where all people are accepted and the news of all people – whether African-American, female, disabled, Jewish, Latino, or transgendered – can be "regular" news, news that is included in mainstream media sources such as newspapers and does not need its own special venue, such as the diversity pages.

However, unfortunately, our society has not reached this ideal state of equality and acceptance yet. There is definitely a danger that minority or non-mainstream groups may be forgotten or ignored by media sources, such as the Collegian, and therefore will not get the space to voice their news and opinions. I am hoping that this doesn't happen, especially at a collegiate newspaper at a very large school with many different kinds of people.

My ideal view of diversity in future editions of the Collegian is that all different people at this school, and in society in general, will be represented by this paper. All true news will be considered valuable and interesting enough to print regardless of which "group" it concerns. Hopefully, integrating diversity into the regular newspaper will also educate those at UMass who skip past the diversity pages that do not "apply" to them, but may read articles about GLBT people that appear in the regular News or Ed-Op sections of the Collegian instead of this page.

Perhaps good things, such as the integration of "minority news" with "mainstream news," will come of the elimination of the diversity pages. Unfortunately, perhaps, bad things may happen as well, such as the elimination of minority points of view from the paper. This will be an interesting experiment in journalism. In the Collegian's campus relations, in the amount of tolerance and acceptance of various groups there is on this campus. I can only hope that the experiment's results will be positive.

Meanwhile, I encourage everyone to get involved with the diversity pages! If you don't think there is enough media coverage of a certain group, especially if it is a minority group, come down to the Collegian and speak to the staff here, or, better yet, volunteer to write for the Collegian yourself. There is only so much we can do here to ensure coverage for all the different groups and people on campus – you, our readers, have to help us as well!

Also, I'd like to take this opportunity to thank all the great people that have written for this page and helped me with it in other ways. It's a wonderful feeling to feel that you are supported in your endeavors, and I have gotten that support from both the people at Pride Alliance (this is my shout-out to all you great board members!) and the staff at the Stonewall Center. I appreciate everything that you have done for me! And, of course, I have to thank my faithful readers. This work would have no purpose without you.

Good luck with finals, everyone, and have a lovely, well-deserved winter break. As for me, I'm signing out for the GLBT Affairs page.

Gay rights activists march on our nation's capital

Interracial Gay Desire

By Jeanie Gorlovsky
Collegian Staff

On December 7th, Angelo Robinson presented the last lecture of the semester in the Stonewall Center's LGBT Studies Lecture Series.

Robinson is a Ph.D. candidate in English at the University of Massachusetts. His lecture was entitled "'Give Me What You Are': The Politics of Race and Desire in Interracial Male Homosexual Relationships." Robinson's lecture came out of his four-part doctoral thesis about black male homosexuality.

Robinson began the lecture with a discussion of Carl Van Vechten, an author who was obsessed with black culture during the Harlem Renaissance in the 20's. He, and other people of his time, viewed the "native" black people in Harlem as "uninhibited, passionate and animalistic" and they had "primitive notions of African sexuality" that portrayed black people as wild, hyper-sexualized beings. Van Vechten took a series of erotic-type photographs with a white man and a black man. Robinson displayed the photographs as a slide show and talked about them to the audience at the lecture. He explained that Van Vechten portrayed the black male as a sexual predator who was satisfying the white man's "fantasy of sexual entrapment." In one picture, Robinson explained, "the white male offers himself to the libidinous black male." The pictures worship the black male for his body and his sexuality.

Robinson then went into a discussion of the portrayal of interracial relationships between black and white gay men by 20th century authors. Many times, in literature as well as in life, these interracial relationships are viewed with a great deal of suspicion. The white men, such as Eric in James Baldwin's Another Country, are viewed as having a "desire for any black body." Some people feel, said Robinson, that "whites want to live out their racial/sexual fantasies" by having sex with black people. Author Charles Mills wrote about the fact that stereotypes of black hypersexuality emasculate black men in terms of power because they are then seen only as sex objects, not intelligent human beings.

Cross-racial sexual desire is also viewed with suspicion when that desire is coming from a black man towards a white man. The esteeming of the white male body as a standard of beauty is seen as very wrong in the black community, and so some black people feel that black men only desire white men because society has made them see white bodies as beautiful.

As Louis Gates wrote, "The white male is desired as the ultimate prize."

A black man's desire for a white man is seen as a symptom of self-hatred. As Reginald Shepard, a black gay man, wrote in his poem "On Not Being White," "How can I separate them when whiteness and beauty are equivalent in my society and my own mind?"

In his conclusion, Robinson explained that his personal view is that interracial desire is not always bad and should not always be viewed with suspicion. For example, in the story Black and Gay – One Man's Story, the black narrator says that his preferring white men to black men as sexual partners are, "really not different than preferring vodka to scotch."

It's just a personal choice.

GLBT Support in the Residence Halls

By Sheena Harrison
The State News (Michigan State U.)

(U-WIRE) EAST LANSING, Mich. – Alexis Bastedo is no stranger to questions like, "How do you guys date?" and, "Is your roommate a lesbian?"

Although the co-director for the Alliance of Lesbian-Bi-Gay and Transgendered students at Michigan State University is sometimes frustrated by the number of questions she gets about being a member of the LBGT community, she said it's often difficult for people outside the community to respond to the curiosity.

"There are just some questions that cannot be answered by someone who's not LBGT," the political science junior said. And that's just one reason why Bastedo feels it's time to implement a new program at Michigan State University.

She and others are part of a small subcommittee of the Alliance which hopes to bring LBGT aides to campus. The program would be comparable to that of minority aides, providing in-hall LBGT support to students and residence hall staffs. Outside the Alliance and the four LBGT residence hall caucus groups, Bastedo said LBGT students aren't receiving the support that other groups have and need.

"We compare ourselves a lot to racial (and) ethnic students because we're a minority," she said. "Look at all they have: aides, staff members, the Multicultural Center. We have a little room in the attic of a building that we're trying to staff with one adviser," said Bastedo, referring to the Alliance's 441 Union office.

Having a residence hall aide program for LBGT students would connect the LBGT community more directly to residence hall staffs and provide more visibility to the community, said Matt Weingarden, another member of the Alliance subcommittee.

"A lot of LGBT students feel uncomfortable living in the residence halls, and a lot of people don't understand LGBT issues because they don't deal with them on a daily basis," the biology sophomore said. "While the groups can exist on campus, it's easier to have a person that you can identify as being LGBT."

The idea of LBGT aides has been around since 1992, when "Moving Forward: Lesbians and Gay Men at Michigan State University" was published. The report gauged the campus climate toward LBGT students according to the University-wide Task Force on Lesbian & Gay Issues, and made suggestions to create a more supportive environment for the community. Bastedo said "Moving Forward" reported a harsh climate toward LBGT students that probably would not have been conducive to a residence hall aide program.

But a student named Dan Jones, who attended MSU at the time of the report and was active in campus organizations, pushed for an aide program so hard that the university allowed him to be the test model.

But once Jones left the university, the effort left with him. "When he left, the momentum for the program just dropped," Bastedo said. "They didn't set up a substantial system or guarantee a position and it was forgotten."

The subcommittee estimates setting up a residence hall aide program for LBGT students would take several years to implement. It took a span of 29 years for the Office of Minority Student Affairs to develop the minority aide program as it exists today. Similar to LBGT students, minority students at MSU felt they didn't have enough support coming from the university, said Rodney Patterson, director of Minority-Student Affairs. And Patterson said the struggle to create the program has been worth it in the benefits it has provided to minority students.

"Many of the students who graduated from the program have said to me, 'If I hadn't had a program like that, I'm not sure I would have graduated from MSU,'" he said.

While Patterson agrees that LBGT students need more support from the university, he said creating an aide program should proceed with caution. "Folks question whether or not replicating this program is the way to go," he said. "There definitely needs to be support systems for LGBT students. The question is, what should those systems look like for LGBT students."

Patterson first heard the idea of creating an LBGT aide program around the time "Moving Forward" was published and said while the idea is good in theory, such a program would probably have to be created from scratch rather than duplicated from another program.

"What needs to be identified first is what's needed in the realm of support, instead of just creating a program that looks like this one," he said. "In my personal opinion, I think many of the needs would be very similar, but at the same time many of the needs could be drastically different."

"Mirror replication could be extremely problematic and not yield the results we want to see. I sense that others concur with that, probably even within the LGBT community."

But while an LBGT aide's job might look similar to that of a minority aide, Bastedo said the subcommittee is looking to create a unique program. "We're not looking at MAs and saying, 'We want one of them,'" she said. "We need support and we need to find a way to get that support. The needs are different and there's a different way to go about accommodating those needs."

Trial Raises Hate Crime Awareness

By Alexandra Gekas
The Daily Cardinal (U. Wisconsin)

(U-WIRE) MADISON, Wis. – A 21-year-old University of Wisconsin-Madison student was on trial for a hate crime Wednesday. He was alleged to have been outside of a Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender dance at Memorial Union where a fight broke out, apparently motivated by prejudice against gays.

This was the scenario presented at Hillel's Hate Crime Mock Trial, an exercise to promote awareness of prejudice and hate crimes. This is the third mock trial that Hillel has organized as a means of promoting awareness of hate crimes.

"(The mock trials) were originally designed to put issues of social importance up for discussion," Hillel adviser Lauren Bloom said.

The defendant was found not guilty in the trial for both battery and a hate-crime enhancer, which would intensify a verdict based on the crime's prejudicial nature. The scenario was intentionally set up so that the focus would remain on the question of hate crimes.

"A hate crime is a crime motivated because of race, sexual preference, ethnicity, etc.," said Andrzej Pease, who played the police officer on the scene. "It's not based on the race or sexual preference of the victim, but on the perception of their race or sexual preference."

The jury decided on a unanimous conviction of battery, but when it came to the hate crime enhancer they were split five-to-four in favor of no enhancer. "We have to determine if the defendant was even partially motivated by prejudice, if 1 percent was based on homophobia, even if 99 wasn't, he is guilty of a hate crime, according to Wisconsin state law," jury member Kevin Otten said. Determining what is a hate crime is subject to interpretation, and the trial exemplified the complications dealt with in a court of law.

"There is a dangerous weakness in the definition of 'hate crime,'" said Marcus Peterson, who acted as a friend of the defendant. "Perception makes the job of the prosecution and jury very complicated."

A clear-cut conclusion of this complicated issue was not reached during the exercise, but the exercise brought it to discussion amongst the students. "I came because I thought the idea of a mock trial was interesting, and because it was about hate crimes, which is something I feel very passionate about," Otten said. "It was a very valuable experience, because it drew a lot of attention to issues which people don't talk about, issues which are relevant and important."

Assistant State Public Defender Mitchell Cooper, who acted as the judge, emphasized the importance of this issue on campuses today.

"It is a relevant topic, but is particularly relevant on a college campus where there is more diversity then people have confronted in their (past) experiences," he said. He said the issue of hate crimes has pertinent on campus. "It is relevant particularly at UW-Madison which draws students predominantly from in-state, where they come from homogenous communities. Some may feel baffled by diversity and this is a way for them to become more sensitive to the things around them," he said.

Another trial is scheduled for next semester.

Out of the fraternity closet at NY's Cornell University

By Nicole Neroulias
Cornell Daily Sun (Cornell U.)

(U-WIRE) ITHACA, N.Y. – When Tim O'Hara '01 signed his bid to a medium-sized fraternity at Cornell University three years ago, the fact that he was gay was something that "just didn't come up."

"If someone had asked me, I would have said yes," he said. "Sexual orientation is just one facet of your personality, so it's not something I would announce to someone right away – just like a straight person wouldn't announce they're straight."

For other gay fraternity men, keeping quiet about their homosexuality while rushing and pledging is a calculated decision. "It's one thing if a brother comes out after he's a brother, it's another to be gay as a pledge," Adam '02 said, a brother in a small house. "The year I pledged, the house decided to not actively rush a freshman because he was gay and out."

Others did not come to terms with their homosexuality until after completing the pledge process; some are still silently questioning their sexual orientation.

According to the Lambda 10 Project, the national clearinghouse for gay, lesbian and bisexual greek issues, based out of Indiana University, some fraternity men remain in the closet years after leaving college, even to the point of getting married and having children.

"There are instances where gay men join fraternities because they subconsciously hope that being in such a heterosexual environment will make them straight," said Shane Windmeyer, coordinator of the Lambda 10 Project.

This tendency to remain closeted while in the fraternity makes it difficult to measure gay greek membership, but Lambda 10 studies estimate that gay and bisexual brothers make up 10 percent of a house. "If you have about 40 members in your chapter, you probably have four who are gay or bisexual," Windmeyer said. "I think the percentage may be even higher."

This estimate would put more than 150 fraternity men at Cornell in this category. Yet Cornell fraternity leaders find this number impossible to believe.

"Homosexuality hasn't been an issue that I've dealt with in my fraternity or in IFC (Interfraternity Council)," said Chris Koza '01, IFC president. "I can't think of anyone I've known in my years in the greek system and IFC who was gay, so I would say those numbers must be pretty low."

"I'm sure there are some people who are gay, but you just don't hear about it," said Sean Mackay '02, IFC vice president of judicial affairs. "You would hope the guys in your house are your brothers and would be willing to accept anything, but I can see people having a problem with it and reacting negatively. And admitting it from the beginning as a rushee might negatively affect your chances of getting a bid."

Regardless of whether Cornell's fraternities meet this national 10 percent estimate, the issue was prevalent enough to warrant the formation of Greeks United Against Homophobia in 1995, a support group for gay, bisexual or questioning fraternity and sorority members. "Greeks United was the initiative of a couple of students who wanted to have a target program recognizing that fraternities and sororities present a unique situation for gay students that other LGBTQ (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgendered and Questioning) organizations couldn't necessarily speak to," explained Susan H. Murphy '75, vice president for student and academic services.

"Because of the membership selection process, living together and new member orientation, they believed there needed to be a focused effort on this environment," she added. "We considered it to be a worthwhile venture."

Greeks United holds weekly hour-long meetings that focus on personal support, sharing information and discussing greek life, according to Sarah Simpkins, the staff advisor for the group and other LGBTQ organizations. "Homophobia has been an issue in the greek system for a long time," she said. "I've learned a lot from this group because their experience is so different from coming out on any other place on campus. In a house, where these are theoretically your brothers, the people you live with, shower with and are your main base of social support, it's very similar to coming out to your family. The impact of rejection makes you extremely vulnerable."

The group, however, has been held back by the absence of a male co-facilitator this semester. "Fraternities and sororities are very different, and guys end up not coming if there's only a female facilitator," Simpkins explained. "Finding 'out' people who have the time and drive to lead these kind of efforts is difficult." Simpkins is working with the Office of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs to invite a gay greek expert to speak at greek events this spring, such as the Delta educational series and the A.D. White Leadership conference.

Jay-Z's fifth LP far from perfect

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

JAY-Z
The Dynasty Roc La Familia
(2000)
Roc-A-Fella

To give Jay-Z credit one could say his last good album from front to back - a feat many rappers never attain, was Vol. 2 Hard Knock Life. To give him less credit, he's a good singles artist. To give even less credit, he's just a rapper that churns out club anthems that sometimes hit, sometimes miss, but consistently are the only beats keeping his otherwise flimsy albums afloat.

Undoubtedly the kingpin of East Coast rap, and arguably the most well-known and consistently hit-making and visible figure in the rap world, Jay-Z's career can be looked at in many different ways. To some, he's one of the few rappers that stays street, never losing the respect of his core fans by veering too far out of the pre-drawn lines of gangsta fronting, mami tolerating, and drugs and booze worshipping. At the same time, casual rap fans are only aware of his larger-than-life hits like "Big Pimpin," content with hearing his tracks on the dancefloor or on mp3, but not quite thrilled at the idea of an hour's worth of album material. Still further outside the spectrum are those that hold up the career of Jay-Z as what not to do in hip-hop, namely the endless focus on superficial themes and misogyny, a school of thought that has spawned countless underground rap artists and a resurgence of anti-mainstream rappers in the mainstream.

Jay-Z's fifth album, The Dynasty, offers plenty of ammunition for all schools of thought on the prolific rapper's legacy. Feminists will have a field day with "Get Your Mind Right Mami," where Jay details how iced wrists and designer clothes constitute the peak of women's empowerment. If you long to see Jay tackle meatier subjects than he has in the past, feel free to skip "Stick 2 The Script" and "The R.O.C." among others. And if you're naive enough to hope that The Dynasty might be a huge artistic leap forward, then stop reading and spin Stankonia again.

No, the new Jay-Z doesn't cover any new ground and won't turn any heads. But there are some interesting moments. "I Just Wanna Love U (Give It 2 Me)" is the ideal Jay-Z song, and it's a shame it doesn't come packaged with 15 additional tracks of baggage. The sharp Neptunes production isn't the only star of the track, Jay's cartoonish playa wordplay is priceless as he ponders "wife-ing" one of his female acquaintances and revels in expensive clothes, alcohol and drugs. It truly is a microcosm of the Jay-Z sound, and stands proudly next to "Big Pimpin" as an indispensable club anthem.

More contemplative tales of street life are well done, such as the towering "Streets Is Talking" and "This Can't Be Life," the latter featuring an excellent cameo by Scarface. The issue of Jay's non-existent father figure and the scars it caused is introduced in the intro and addressed throughout the album's more serious tracks like "Streets Is Talking" and the album's impeccably produced and haunting coda "Where Have You Been."

Dynasty is simply too inconsistent to be considered a good album, and without more varied beats and subject matter, all but the most hardcore will find themselves bored at times within the album's 66 minutes. Small and carefully chosen doses are the way to handle this album, and hopefully Jay will slow down his incessant album schedule (five in less than four years) and spend more time crafting his next release.

"Trenchtown Rocks" in Student Union last Wed.

THE WAILERS
Dec. 6

On Wednesday night, the reggae powerhouse the Wailers played to a packed house at the Student Union Ballroom. The Wailers, a ten-piece band, is comprised of three musicians from the original Wailers band who performed with Bob Marley before his untimely death in 1981. By the huge crowd that they pulled in and the music that they made it is obvious that they are carrying on in his spirit.

Lead singer Gary "Nesta" Pine certainly casts a likeness to Marley, with his performance style and smooth, Rasta-fied voice. As for the music, I was unsure coming in if we were going to be delighted with the wonderful music of the Wailers of old, or if we were there to just see a very good reggae band. I am glad to say that we got both.

The show opened slowly with a smooth, jazzy jam highlighting the great skills of original member Al Anderson on guitar. His strong, wailing solos throughout the night added a new dimension to this type of music, which cannot be heard from listening to an album. We are introduced to the raspy voice of "Nesta" from the start as he laid down, "This is Reggae Music" with two "soulful sisters" on back-up vocals. Next came a smattering of old Marley favorites as the band gracefully worked through a grooving "Trenchtown Rock," "I Shot the Sheriff," "Rebel Music" and "Natty Dread." These songs were cut very similar to the album versions with a little soloing segment, especially noticeable on "Natty."

After a little sarcastic anti-ganja message to the college crowd of about 1300 by "Nesta," the Wailers ended their set with another trifecta of Marley classics with "Stir It Up," "No Woman, No Cry" and "Jamming." Towards the end of the show, the band allowed the crowd to get involved with the music as the lead singer went back and forth chanting the lyrics with the crowd.

After a quick break, the band returned onstage for the encore which began with a spirited "Redemption Song" dedicated to Haile Selassie, an Ethiopian Emperor who was a strong advocate for Black Rights and equality.

To end the show, the band whipped out a great rendition of "Get Up, Stand Up," which ended the show on a very high note. I am extremely glad that this show was well attended, as I have seen many shows in the area falter. This success can be attributed to the hard work and solid planning of UPC, who should be applauded.

Billboard Music Awards hand out honors to boybands, Creed

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Correspondent

While accepting the Male Artist of the Year award at the 14th annual Billboard Music Awards on December 5th, Sisqo made sure to thank the thong. Sisqo's naughty ditty "Thong Song" helped him win six awards at the ceremony, including New Artist of the Year, winning more awards than any other artist or group.

The awards, hosted by comedian Kathy Griffin and chart topping sensation 'N Sync, were determined by Billboard magazine's year-end chart rankings based on a combination of record sales and radio airplay. The best selling artists of the past year were on hand to accept their awards and to perform some of the biggest hits of the year.

Destiny's Child, which has occupied the no. 1 slot on the pop singles chart for the past four weeks with "Independent Women Part 1," earned the Artist of the Year award, the most coveted award of the night. The R&B trio, despite countless lineup changes this past year, was also named Hot 100 Singles Artist of the Year, Hot 100 Singles Group of the Year, and Group of the Year with the help of their breakthrough single "Say My Name."

Creed, who last week won four trophies at the My VH1 Music Awards, was named Rock Artist of the Year for the second consecutive time, this time in recognition of its hit album Human Clay. The album has sold more than six million copies and has produced the hits "With Arms Wide Open" and "Higher," the latter of which the band performed for the ceremony atop the nearby Rio hotel.

'N Sync, performed "Just Got Paid" and at the end of the song the boys dug into their pockets and shouted "O man...we're broke!" Riright. 'N Sync's album No Strings Attached sold a record 2.4 million copies in its first week of release last March and earned the group the Album of the Year honor. The now certified 10-times platinum album also earned the boy group Top 40 Artist of the Year and a Special Billboard Award for biggest one-week sales ever of an album.

There were enough prizes to go around for both Britney Spears, who was named Albums Artist of the Year, and no. 1 competitor Christina Aguilera who was crowned Female Artist of the Year. Spears, also earned the other special Billboard Award for biggest one week sales of an album ever by a female artist for her mega-successful "Oops...I Did It Again."

Texas trio the Dixie Chicks were named Country Artist of the Year, while Faith Hill snagged the Hot 100 Single of the Year prize for her song "Breathe," which she also performed at the event.

Other highlights of the show included, the former "Brady Bunch" actor Barry Williams singing "The Real Greg Brady," a spoof of Eminem's hit "The Real Slim Shady." Williams mimicked the controversial rapper's performance at the MTV Video Music Awards in September, walking down the aisles with several other Greg Brady look-alikes that wore curly brown wigs and polyester.

The Baha Men won World Music Artist of the Year and World Music Album of the Year for Who Let The Dogs Out. The group opened the show with the album's hit title track, which helped them win both awards, while dogs ran down the aisles of the arena.

3 Doors Down also enjoyed a big night by winning three awards, including Best New Group, and performed its hit "Kryptonite," complete with a costumed "Superman" who "flew" across the Vegas skyline.

Griffin joked throughout the show that she was trying to determine which member of 'N Sync she should marry. At one point, she handcuffed herself to Justin Timberlake. But Spears, who is dating the 'N Syncer, quickly came to the rescue. She freed her beau and shouted to Griffin: "Easy, skank, step off!" to which Griffin replied: "You step off, you biatch!" The comedic hit ended when Timberlake said, "Ladies, don't get your panties in a wad. There's enough Justin for everybody." Teenage girls only wish it were true.

The show wasn't all teen-oriented, however, as former Eagles songwriter Don Henley presented singer/songwriter Randy Newman Billboard's previously announced Century Award for distinguished creative achievement.

Rugrats a delightful film

By Jake D. Lewis

RUGRATS IN PARIS: THE MOVIE
Directed by Stig Bergqvist Paul Demeyer
With Christine Cavanaugh, Cheryl Chase, Elizabeth Daily
Playing at Cinemark 12 in Hadley

I have never seen an episode of the Nickelodeon kid-craze TV show "The Rugrats." The reason behind this is rather simple – at the time of the show's inception, I had grown out of the Nick phase, much in sync with the departure of Mark Summers from "Double Dare" and the cancellation of the awkwardly appealing "You Can't Do That On Television!" A generation of Nick had already gone by, and the one to follow brought with it programs like "Rocco's Modern World," "Sponge Bob," and "The Rugrats." These zany shows are ideal kid fodder and are just waiting to be adapted to the big screen.

To The Rugrats, though, the movie industry is familiar territory. Much like the film I'm reviewing, Rugrats In Paris: The Movie, I'll keep my critique short, sweet and to-the-point. If this sequel to the 1998 film is any indication of the of the television series itself, I may tune in yet. My words will most likely fall upon deaf ears, though, since it seems reasonable that college students would not go see this movie or watch the show. Even so, the film is chockfull of humor that can be appreciated by all ages, and has a running time short enough to avoid rattling any parent's nerves.

This time the Rugrats gang is in The City of Love, Paris, where Tommy's dad has been dispatched to fix a robot he determine which member of 'N Sync she should marry. At one point, she handcuffed herself to Justin Timberlake. But Spears, who is dating the 'N Syncer, quickly came to the rescue. She freed her beau and shouted to Griffin: "Easy, skank, step off!" to which Griffin replied: "You step off, you biatch!" The comedic hit ended when Timberlake said, "Ladies, don't get your panties in a wad. There's enough Justin for everybody." Teenage girls only wish it were true.

façade, and vow to stop the misguided Chazz before he ties the knot.

The film shows incredible heart, especially in regards to the deceased mother storyline, but at the same time doesn't get caught up in its own cheesiness. Moments like the one when Chucky sees his mother's silhouette in the clouds outside his plane window while en route to France are straightforward enough to be simple and bittersweet at the same time.

While the film focuses mostly on Chucky and his search for a new mommy, the other characters offer the comic relief that keeps the movie charming and fluffy. Take for instance when baby Dil wets himself and says "Wee wee!" only for Tommy to respond "He's speaking French already!" Cutesy puns and double-entendres like this are what keep the movie funny and fast-paced, never taking itself too seriously.

Additionally, the anti-Disney animation style is a pleasure on the eyes; the characters here are much rounder and brighter than most other animated features of late, and really hearkens back to what cartoons should, ideally, look like.

Take the kids, take the grandparents, take the family pet, Rugrats In Paris: The Movie is a delightful and fun family film that can be enjoyed by all.

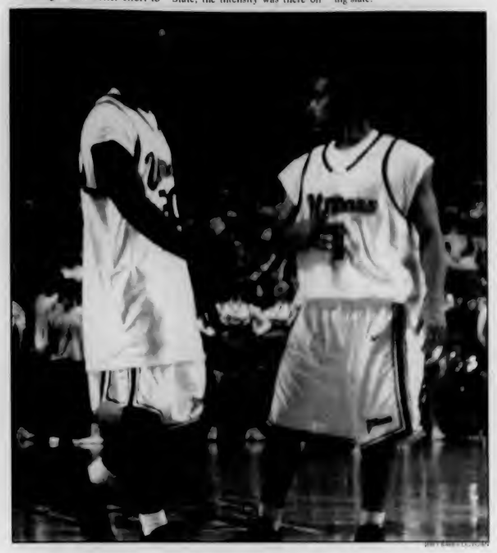
with inside."

That's not even to mention senior center Souleymane Wane, a Senegal original who came up even bigger than his 6-foot-11 frame in UConn's recent upset of Arizona.

Even as victory has eluded them, Flint's troops have managed to grow with each loss this year and bring a little better effort to each successive contest. The team solved its season-long free throw problem by converting 15-of-18 from the charity stripe against Ohio State on Sunday night, a game that also saw one of UMass' most complete defensive efforts of the year thus far.

"Our defense has improved all season," Flint said. "Against Ohio State, the intensity was there on the defensive end the whole time. We need to bring that against UConn."

That would at least be a good start toward upsetting the favored Huskies and getting back on the winning track. Because unlike the girl in the commercial, UMass can ill-afford to drop much more if it hopes to salvage this already trying slate.



Jonathan DePina and Shannon Crooks take advantage of the stoppage of play by having a chat at midcourt.

Minutemen send Husky swimmers scurrying back to Nutmeg State

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

This past Saturday, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team did something that the men's basketball team will try and do later tonight; beat Connecticut. The Minutemen improved to a record of 5-2 with a 139-104 victory over the Huskies. All in all, the Minutemen took 10 events during the meet and head into their winter break on a two-meet winning streak.

Senior Chris Arsenault once again led the way for the Maroon and White, as he took two individual firsts and one more in the 400-yard freestyle relay. In the 200-yard butterfly, Arsenault finished with a time of 1:54.78. He followed this win with another in the 200-yard freestyle. Arsenault's time of 1:42.62 was good enough for the second best time of the year for the Minutemen. This season the senior holds the Atlantic 10's fastest time in an amazing five events.

Arsenault, who won the Atlantic 10 Men's Swimming and Diving Performer of the Week for the second straight week and the third time this season, also led the Minutemen to a first place finish in the 400-yard freestyle relay. Arsenault combined with fellow senior Mike Sabina and a pair of sophomores, Chad Arnold and Ryan Zaucha, to take the event with a time of 3:09.41.

Other winners for the Minutemen included junior Ryan Fisher, sophomore Tommy Keane and freshman Logan Alomar. Fisher registered the best time of the season for UMass in the 50-yard freestyle. His time of 21.23 was more than two tenths of a second better than Sabina's former best time of 21.44.

Keane continued his recent fine form by winning the 1000-yard freestyle in a time of 9:43.76. In the last two meets Keane has picked up three individual first place finishes. Alomar has also performed very well lately and picked up his second consecutive victory in the three-meter dive competition. Alomar's score of 289.95 was better than that of anybody else on the Minutemen this year, but missed his top score by almost eight full points.

Victories from the quartet of Arsenault, Fisher, Keane and Alomar have become the norm as of late, but it was the really performance of some other swimmers that secured the victory for UMass.

Senior Billy Brown and sophomore Zaucha, a pair of Californians, came up big for the Minutemen, each winning multiple events. Brown took the 200-yard breaststroke and was in on the 400 medley relay victory. In the 200 breast, Brown finished with a time of 2:03.54, just barely missing his season best time. In the 400 medley relay, Brown teamed up with Zaucha, Sabina and fellow senior Joe Martin to knock off the Huskies in a time of 3:26.50.

Along with his two relay wins, Zaucha also placed first in the 200-yard backstroke in a time of 1:53.67. Freshman Peter Tawczynski rounded out the winners for UMass by taking the 200-yard individual medley in a time of 1:55.86. The win was just Tawczynski's second of the season for the Minutemen.

The Minutemen now have almost an entire month off before returning to action on Saturday Jan. 6 at the Sarasota Invitational in Sarasota, Fl.

Minutewomen drop second straight meet with loss to rival UConn

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

There will never come a time, here at the University of Massachusetts, when a loss is easily swallowed. Likewise the day will never arrive when a loss to hitter rival Connecticut does not leave a bad taste in the collective mouth of the UMass women's swimming and diving team.

The Minutewomen left for Storrs, CT on Saturday with hopes of returning to their winning ways. Unfortunately for the Maroon and White however, Huskies can actually swim.

UMass fell 144-106, but the meet was not without its positives, as the Minutewomen have tried to prepare for Atlantic 10 competition through a tough out-of-conference schedule.

UConn represented one of those strong inter-conference foes, but the Maroon and White were far from intimidated.

The constants for the UMass squad: junior stars and relay success remained consistent, despite the stiffened competition.

Junior Becky Hunnewell was victorious in the 200-yard backstroke, recording a time of 2:07.35. Classmate Andrea Kazanjian was also a winner, as she took the 100-yard flystroke in 59.09.

The 200-yard freestyle relay team also retained its dominance by capturing the race in 1:38.65. Two sophomores, Lizzy Boyle and Molly Buckley, and two juniors, Anne Dettloff and Kazanjian, got the win for UMass.

Christen Dexter continued to impress in her already stellar rookie season, as she finished second in the 100 yard breastroke. Her time of 1:07.45 moves her to second on the all-time list in this event.

Dettloff posted her team's best time of the season at 10:29.85 in the 1000-yard freestyle, good enough for a second place finish.

Kate Allery maintained the form she has shown all year in finishing second in both the one-meter and three-meter diving events.

With the defeat UMass drops its second straight to move to 5-2. The Minutewomen now look ahead to January 6th when they will compete in the Sarasota Invitational in Florida.

Alex Rodriguez, don't say it's not the money. Please, when you get interviewed about the hundreds of millions of dollars that you will make in the next ten years, don't tell people that it was about respect, image, the team you were heading to, or whatever else pops into your head. It's not – it's the money.

Do you realize what you have just done, Mr. Rodriguez? You've sold yourself to the highest bidder, and now you're playing for a team that doesn't have a shot in Hell as long as you're there, because you're sucking up so much out of their payroll.

What were you thinking? Do you really think that Texas is going to be able to afford more than spare parts to put around you? Aren't you worried about something besides the "m" and the "e" in team? Alex, I don't see how you were in it for anything else here. You're leaving behind a team that was one series short of going to the World Series last year for one that quite frankly, sucked.

The Mariners went 91-71 last year, during the regular season. The Rangers went 71-91. Of course you know all of that... don't you?

Until now, I don't think that most of us realized what you are. For the longest time, people associated you with the other shortstops in the American League that dominate, like Nomar Garciaparra and Derek Jeter. What were we thinking? Right or wrong, I think that most baseball fans see a big difference between you and them now. The difference is that they care about more than just their wallets, and they want to win the World Series.

Realistically, I don't even see how your Texas teammates will be able to consider you a team player. You can dive for all of the ground balls that you want. You can hit .500 and knock in 250 runs. Within three years, they're going to be grumbling because Texas is still going to have no pitching, and they're still not going to be able to afford any.

Don't forget about your new, adoring southern-fried fans, either. This spring, they're going to greet you with arms open, hailing their messiah. But wait – since ticket prices are probably going to go up to pay for your services, they're going to expect a lot. I hope you learned how to throw a forkball this winter, Alex.

They're probably going to need you out of the ballpen every other night. Maybe it's just me. I always had this image in my head of you. You were the G.Q. superstar, kind of a Grant Hill of baseball. I always thought your image mattered to you, that you cared what the general baseball world thought of you.

I guess you don't.

Most of the baseball community is going to look at this in one of a couple of ways. You are either: A) one of the greediest damn players that has ever walked the face of the Earth; B) totally oblivious to what this contract would do to your fan support; or C) too weak to tell your agent, Scott Boras, to chill out. The way I look at it, it's probably some of each.

Oh well, it's not my problem. I probably would have signed with one of the four, count them, four play-off teams that wanted you. You could have signed with the Mariners, Mets, Braves or White Sox. You do realize that as soon as you put your name on that contract with Texas, Seattle started lining up replacements for you. No, it won't be easy, but there are plenty of options.

The Mariners want to replace you with Mike Bordick in the field and Johnny Damon at the plate. Along with Seattle's new sensational Japanese import outfielder Ichiro Suzuki, the Mariners are a lock for the playoffs if they get those two guys. Is Texas? Nope.

Happy Holidays, Alex, and good luck next season. You're going to need it, tough guy.

Minutewoman trio earns regional honors

Three members of the Massachusetts women's soccer team received additional post-season honors over the weekend. Juniors Brooke Bartlett, Sarah Cook and Julie Podhrasky all tacked onto their first-team All-Atlantic 10 selections with some regional accolades.

Podhrasky, the A-10 Defensive Player of the Year, earned New England Women's Soccer Association All-New England and National Soccer Coaches Association of America North East Regional second team honors. The UMass keeper was 7-7 on the season with a 1.31 goals against average.

In addition, Bartlett and Cook joined Podhrasky on the NSCAA North East Regional team. Bartlett, a second team member along with Podhrasky, led the Minutewomen in scoring with 21 points and was also an All A-10 Tournament pick.

Cook, the captain of the UMass squad tallied one point on the season from her sweeper position. However, her most important contributions came defensively, as she led a defense that allowed just 20 goals in 19 games this season. For her efforts, she was tabbed to the third team.

Path to victory 'blocked' by Ohio State

Johnson, Buckeyes outlast Minutemen

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

COLUMBUS, OH – Ohio State men's basketball coach Jim O'Brien was concerned about how his team would handle the formidable front line of visiting Massachusetts on Sunday night. With 6-foot-11 sophomore Micah Brand starting for UMass alongside 6-foot-10 senior Kitwana Rhymer, it appeared that the Minutemen might indeed have an advantage.

But when the smoke cleared at the Value Center Arena, it was a Buckeye big man who had made all the difference in OSU's 54-51 win.

Senior pivot Ken Johnson blocked nine UMass shots and altered countless others as the Minutemen shot a season-low 16.7 percent from the floor in the first half and managed a game-long field goal percentage of only 25.4. OSU didn't fair much better (39.2 percent from the floor) and watched a 26-13 halftime edge disintegrate into a slim three-point margin when UMass' Monty Mack canned a long three-pointer with 1:29 remaining.

Ohio State	54

But Mack (a game-high 22 points) and company could get no closer, as the senior All-American's last ditch heave at the buzzer fell short and his team fell to 1-5 on the year.

"I think we're our own worst enemy," Mack said. "We hold ourselves back. We wait until we're down to knuckle down and play defense."

The sellout crowd at the Value Center got behind Johnson and the Bucks (5-2) right off the opening tip, as the 6-foot-11 Detroit native rejected three shots in the first five minutes and allowed OSU to take an 8-0 lead. UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint urged his troops to attack the towering center, but the Minutemen were visibly tentative in the paint and allowed Johnson to take away their inside-out game plan.

"I kept telling them you've got to go at shotblockers," Flint said. "You've got to take it through their chest to their chin and let them know you came to play. You start fading away, and he'll block every single thing you put up."

Even the Maroon and White perimeter game had its problems early, as senior point guard Jonathan DePina was burglarized by OSU's Brent Darby as the UMass floor general was calling a play. As DePina signaled to his floormates with his left hand, Darby snatched the ball from his right and streaked away for an easy break-away layup.

Mack tried his best to keep the game close, knocking down a trifecta from the left corner and earning three free throws for a clobbering from Buckeye Will Dudley on another attempt from international waters. The pre-season Atlantic 10 Player of the Year fought through almost constant double teams for much of the evening en route to his third-straight 20-point outing.

"Any guy who has the green light like he does is really hard to guard," O'Brien said. "I don't think we could have done a much better job than we did."

Flint's troops hit the locker room having connected on only 5-of-30 field goals, including a combined 3-of-15 from Brand and Rhymer. Johnson, meanwhile, had already amassed 10 points and seven blocks at the halfway point.

The Minutemen hit the hardwood in the second half with revenge seemingly on their minds, as they joined the block party with five stuffs of their own in the first 10 minutes of the frame. Brand got it started with a forceful ejection on OSU's Zach Williams, and Rhymer finished off the surge with subsequent stuffs that allowed UMass to climb back within nine, 39-30.

The Buckeyes helped their foes get back in as well, committing a number of offensive miscues and cooling off considerably from the floor.

"We lost a little bit of our composure on the offensive end," O'Brien said. "We committed offensive fouls, threw up a couple of runners and even stepped out of bounds once.

"They were tough kids and they guarded us tough; we didn't get very many good looks at all."

But as wide-open as the Bucks left the door, UMass seemed anything but eager to run through it and regain momentum. The Minutemen squandered a handful of prime opportunities to climb back in around the six minute mark, turning the ball over on 3-of-6 possessions before Mack sank a pair from the charity stripe to pull UMass within seven, 48-41.

JARET BARRICK/COLLEGIAN

Winston Smith surveys the court before deciding where to inbound the ball.

"We've been getting hurt because we have five or six minute stretches that absolutely kill us," Flint said.

After a free throw from Buckeye Boban Savovic, Maroon and White tri-captain Winston Smith connected on a critical three to pull his squad within five, 49-44, with less than three minutes showing on the clock.

That same five-point margin still stood (52-47) when UMass took possession with 27.6 ticks remaining, but guard Shannon Crooks inexplicably dribbled into and back out of the OSU zone to kill off most of the clock and any chance of a Maroon and White comeback.

"Those are the types of things that have been killing us all season," Flint said. "[Crooks] beat his man to the hoop, but he said he wasn't sure if we should be going for two or three. The crazy thing was that we did game situations yesterday at the end of practice."

In a numbers game, 13 proves again to be unlucky

BRYAN SMITH

COLUMBUS, OH – If one were to describe the Massachusetts men's basketball team in a single word, it would be UNLUCKY. Synonymous with the word unlucky is the No. 13. In Sunday's 54-51 loss at the Value City Arena to defending Big Ten champion Ohio State, 13 proved to be what did the Minutemen in.

13 – The number of points the Maroon and White scored in the first half of the game with the Buckeyes. In the game's opening 20 minutes, UMass shot an anemic 5-for-30 from the field, and of the 25 misses, most came from within three feet of the basket.

12 – In that same half Ohio State doubled the Minutemen's score, as it missed a mere 12 field goal attempts out of 22. Center Ken Johnson and guard Brian Brown carried the offensive load in the frame, shooting a combined 7-for-11 from the floor.

11 – UMass was unable to make shots close to the basket, as it was intimidated by the best shot-blocker in the nation, Johnson. In the game the Buckeyes turned back 11 Minuteman shots, with nine coming from Johnson and one each from Brown and Boban Savovic.

10 – A valiant second-half comeback by the Maroon and White shaved 10 points off the OSU lead, but the effort came up just short when Brent Darby iced the game by making two free throws with 0.2 seconds remaining on the clock. That was not enough time for Monty Mack to get off his length-of-the-court heave, an attempt that if made would have sent the game into overtime.

9 – UMass again proved that it was a one-dimensional team, as only nine field goals were made by players other than Mack in a game where nine Minutemen aside from the senior guard logged court time. The Minutemen have struggled this year to find a balanced offensive attack and are still in search of a combination that is able to score points in bunches.

8 – In the first half the Maroon and White turned the ball over to the Buckeyes eight times. As if shooting 5-for-30 was not bad enough, UMass shot itself in the foot by being careless with the ball on both ends of the court, as OSU scrapped to cause the miscues.

7 – It took the Buckeyes seven attempts from behind the arch to extend their consecutive games with a three-pointer made to 257. The shot came from the hands of Peabody native Sean Connolly. Connolly left Providence College, a team that UMass lost to on Dec. 8 at the Mullins Center, after OSU Head Coach Jim O'Brien was lured away from Boston College to the Big Ten powerhouse.

6 – Mack did not have his best shooting day wearing the maroon and white, as he made only 6-of-19 from the floor in the loss. Despite the less than stellar day from the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Candidate, he posted a game-high 22 points, with 17 coming in the second half.

5 – Five losses in a row. That is where the Minutemen stand heading into tonight's game MassMutual U-game with No. 11 Connecticut at the Hartford Civic Center. The five-game skid is the first time that a UMass squad has suffered such a tailspin since the 1989-90 season, the second season under the tutelage of current Memphis Head Coach John Calipari.

4 – Four is the amount of times that Maroon and White center Kitwana Rhymer turned the ball over. Two of the turnovers came in the game's opening few minutes, as he was called for a duo of traveling violations while trying to gain position on Johnson on the block. The other two came in the second half, as the big man was called for a pair of offensive fouls for leading with his shoulder while making his move to the basket.

3 – Having three guards on the floor at the same time has been a forte of UMass Head Coach James "Bruiser" Flint this season. Flint inserted 6-foot-11 forward Micah Brand into the starting lineup and O'Brien countered the move by sending three of his guards (Brown, Savovic and Connolly) on the court to start the game. O'Brien felt that he would not be able to match the size of UMass and thought that the best way to offset Brand would be to beat the Minutemen with a quicker quintet.

2 – Two more road games before the Maroon and White return to the William D. Mullins Center to face BC. Being on the road is something that Flint-coached teams are accustomed to, as they have played 83-of-133 contests away from Amherst in his five years at the helm.

1 – One game at a time. That is what this Minuteman team has to do if it wants to right the ship. It can ill-afford to look ahead to the A-10 season; it must concentrate on taking care of business with the Huskies tonight. It must focus on getting better on a game-by-game basis.

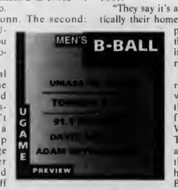
Hoops and hype: U-game set to explode in Hartford

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

The commercials have been airing on ESPN for practically a week now. They show a doe-eyed Katie Holmes look-alike holding up signs and dropping them a la INXS' "I Need You Tonight" video.

The first sign: UConn. The second: UMass. The third: U-game. That's really all you need in terms of an introduction to this one.

The now traditional yearly war between the Massachusetts and Connecticut men's basketball teams doesn't need much fanfare. It is a marquee matchup between two of college athletics' most bitter rivals, set to unfold tonight with a 7 pm tipoff at the Hartford Civic Center.



For UMass (1-5) and Head Coach James "Bruiser" Flint, the Mass-Mutual-sponsored melee is about more than just regional bragging rights.

"It's not about the U-game to us," Flint said. "It's about trying to get some wins that we need."

Need is probably a gross understatement, considering that the Minutemen have now dropped five straight after beating Iona in their regular-season opener. A win in the U-game would give the Maroon and White its first victory over the Huskies (7-1) since 1983.

Tonight's action in Hartford is theoretically not a home game for either team, but the Huskies will no doubt enjoy an advantage in the 16,294-seat Civic Center. The Huskies have lost only once in their last 60 non-conference games there, with the lone defeat being a 73-65 setback to Kansas in 1997.

"They say it's a neutral site, but it's practically their home court," Flint said. "They play most of their games there. For us, all it means is that it's not as long of a ride."

That's fine with the road-wary Minutemen, who are in the eye of a three-date hurricane away from the shelter of the William D. Mullins Center. The team will face UConn and Boston University on the road before returning home to host the Eagles of Boston College.

In terms of competition, the Huskies will present the Minutemen with their biggest challenge of this young season. UConn boasts one of the nation's most athletic frontcourt duos in freshman Caron Butler (6-foot-7) and senior Edmund Saunders (6-foot-8). Additional paint punch comes off the Husky bench in the form of junior Johnnie Selvie, a 6-foot-7 Michigan native known for his strength down low.

"There are some tough matchups for us against UConn," Flint said. "Butler, Saunders and Selvie are all real physical players who will be tough for us to match up

SGA Senate tries to move on

Without the Student Government Association Senate after last week's controversial judicial decision, many have been left without jobs and with questions of what is to come for the SGA.

Although some former Senators have been unable to press on, others are finding, or at least trying to find, ways to work around the tensions and move forward without any official title.

Questions are still on the rise as far as the legality of the Judiciary hearing that took place before the Thanksgiving break and to complicate matters, there have been rampant rumors of possible civil suits from disenfranchised former Senators. Whether there is any legitimacy to the rumors is yet to be determined. The issues surrounding taking legal action on the side of the petitioned is one that is being looked into at this present time, according to some internal, but unnamed, SGA sources.

"We spoke to [Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs] Javier Cevallos about it and he is looking into the legal issues with the University's lawyers," Chair of Finance Jeff Bazydlo said. "We're looking into it and having the case reviewed to see what the opinions of others are as far as where we go from here."

Speaker Jim Eltringham also commented on the situation of a possible civil suit against the University of Massachusetts in direct relationship to the SGA.

"We want to have the case reviewed so we know that if we brought this issue to court that we

Textbook buyback? Depends on who's doing the buying

MAUREEN MASSE / COLLEGIAN

Students can sell textbooks back to the Textbook Annex.

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

With textbook buy-backs beginning today, questions have arisen over what is the best course of action: selling books back to the Textbook Annex, or to other, privately owned businesses.

Whether you purchase your books online, from other students or from the Textbook Annex itself, when it comes down to the end of the semester, for many students it's about getting some of the many dollars you spent back. Deciding on the most profitable option can be a mind-wrenching decision and one that has caused much debate.

A recent email sent by the Textbook Annex to every undergraduate student at the University of Massachusetts sparked much controversy among students on campus.

The email explained that students need to be aware of persons selling books door-to-door in the dorms. It continued to state that these "scams" are not authorized or affiliated with the Textbook Annex in any way. Students were advised to contact the University of Massachusetts Police Department if unauthorized book vendors were seen in residence halls.

"Persons selling books to students does not affect the Text Book Annex, but it affects the students who purchase the books," Alumni Jennifer Lee said. "We have had two complaints in the past about people going door-to door and selling books stating that their prices are better than us, and then students find out that this information is wrong."

However, some disagree with this statement. Jeff Nelson, a sophomore Engineering major, explained that sending this email out to all students, and implying that selling books outside of the Textbook Annex is illegal, was not right.

"This email implied that it is illegal to sell books without any explanation, and this is not fair or right," Nelson said. "I personally don't think that they buy books back at the percentages they say they will. I turned in a new book

Alternative Spring Break

We want to affect social change, but how do we do it? This is one way.
-Levin Sibley-Schwartz

Volunteer students from UMass work on a house last spring in New Road, Virginia.

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Most students go to Jamaica or Cancun for Spring Break. It is their week off, a time to relax, a time to drink, a time for revelry and merriment, for mirth and mead, for sin and debauchery. Spring Break is a week away from "it all" and then, back to the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus.

For some though, UMass is being away from it all. For some, UMass is the distraction or the dividing line, a wall perhaps, between the real world and them. It is a wall that they want to break down. These people are using the Alternative Spring Break as one of the hammers to take down that wall.

"What excites me is that this is such an unorthodox way of getting a liberal arts or University education."
-Kent Higgins

The Basics

The biggest misconception about Alternative Spring Break is that it is only a break itself. This is not so. Instead, it is an academic course that happens to include as one of its components a trip over Spring Break. The academics are taught by fellow students and are broken into two separate sections.

Megan McGrory, an undeclared sophomore, oversees the Inter-Religious Project (IRP), although she describes it as "not actually that religion based."

"Kent Higgins runs it really [Higgins is a Protestant minister in the area – ed.] and he started it with Art Keene. When Art broke off with the Anthro Grassroots, Higgins focused on this one," McGrory said.

She said that while some of the classes are more religious than others, most classes are non-denominational.

"We definitely do more exploration in traditional spirituality than the others do," she said. "We study the Native American community and how they might have been affected by Christianity."

McGrory's trip last year took her to Cherokee, North Carolina, and this year she will lead a similar trip. While there, she participated in community service, home renovations, cleaning and mulching. She also listened to guest speakers that included a local medicine woman, a local politician and community elders. McGrory's outlook is one of youth. The sophomore is coming through the system, and if she is to be called developing, then Omar Guessous could be called an integral part of that system.

Guessssous, who helped to coordinate this story and wanted to make sure that he wasn't the primary focus, is graduated and now works for the UMass Office of Community Service Learning. He himself went on an ASB, though his was to Caroline County, Virginia, but his trip was

Pedestrain safety tops UMPD's concerns

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department expressed concern about pedestrian safety following an incident on Friday in which a pedestrian was struck by a motor vehicle in a crosswalk near the Fine Arts Center.

Nineteen-year-old Alyssa D. Warren was struck by a van at approximately 7:30 p.m. and rushed to Baystate Hospital. She was released on Sunday.

"There was some concern at the time because there was blood and so forth," Jim Lyons, the spokesman for the UMPD, "But luckily she was treated quickly."

According to Lyons, motor vehicle accidents involving pedestrians are not an uncommon occurrence. He explained that last year alone there were two fatalities due to incidents that occurred between motor vehicles and people on foot. The trend has continued this year as well.

"We have had five [pedestrians hit] this fall, including the one that was just reported," Lyons said.

He explained that of the five incidents this year, one took place off campus, and two incidents involved bicyclists.

To address the issue of pedestrian safety on campus, a study was done and a task force implemented to determine how to better ensure pedestrian safety at UMass. The results of the survey found that, among other things, crosswalks needed to be marked more clearly on campus. Some of the changes recommended by the task force's report have been put into effect, while others are in the process of being implemented.

On a different note, an automatic fire alarm went off in John Adams Dormitory on Sunday after several bulletin boards on the 10th floor were lit on fire. Four students were referred to housing after they failed to evacuate the building, and Robert Murphy, 19, of Springfield, was arrested for trespassing. He had been issued a trespassing warning from the police department at a prior occasion.

"The case remains under investigation to see if we can find out who set the bulletin board on fire," Lyons explained.

Another incident also occurred on Sunday in Van Meter Dormitory, where approximately eight students were attempting to kick down a door to the roof.

"It appears that one of them gave the excuse that someone had been trying to throw his keys to the forth floor and threw them up too high," Lyons said. "He was going to the roof to reclaim them."

through the University of Massachusetts Alliance for Community Transformation's (U-ACT) ASB program: Grassroots Community Development. Started by the previously mentioned Arthur Keene, an Anthropology professor, the GCD is a four-credit course in the spring. Though Keene used to teach it, he now helps only to coordinate, leaving much of the teaching to students.

Guessous, like McGrory will be this year, was a leader last year. He also helps to coordinate the program, having graduated last year but choosing to stay on as a paid employee. He works to arrange trips with communities, faculty, staff and students.

"We've doubled in size since this began. We're very student run and initiated, and with the help of another faculty member, we do all of our own fund-raising, we have input on the class curriculum, we lead trainings and fill up the slots of the program," Guessous said. (See contact information on how to get in touch with some of those mentioned in this article)

Guessous originally went to Caroline County. Five hundred miles of rural area, Guessous described it as an area of wealth "with hidden poverty."

"There are huge mansions and packed trailer yards. Twelve of us tried to convince community members who were slightly more well-off to get involved in their community, to see what was in their backyard. We combined that sort of work with our concrete work. We roofed and built handicap ramps, steps and a deck. We cleaned for one elderly couple and made them dinner," Guessous said. "But that work isn't long-term."

At the end of ASB days, the group comes together to reflect on their experiences.

"We don't go through the motions of just building a ramp and leaving. What are the factors that are playing into this situation? What can I take back to Amherst or into my future career? We're trying to get people to be more socially conscious and more socially critical," he said.

That is a distinction fairly unique to UMass. All local interviewees reported that the few schools in the nation have any sort of academic component to their classes. For the locals, they don't seem to want to go through a process that Guessous described as "meet on Friday before Spring Break, leave, work for the week and come back." He said that UMass hopes to focus on the communities themselves through a more holistic approach, both in the nightly reflections and with ASB's rigorous academic content.

Planning

Levin Sibley-Schwartz, an Americorps Vista Officer and office manager for U-ACT, like so many others involved in the program, came through the system before taking a seriously active role in overseeing it.

"As an undergrad, I was in the program as a student, and now I'm the person working in the office. I do the logistics, the facilitating in one of the classes. I work on the inner-management of the program, the interworkings of the program. We do everything to make this work. We do the enrollments of students, we send out applications, we do fund-raising, we send letters to different companies, we review curriculum, we always keep reading new books, we do facilitation management program workshops, leadership training workshops," Sibley-Schwartz (who went to both the Carolinas and Caroline County) said. "In a lot of ways, we're always training some of the leaders for UMass campus life."

The number of leaders is increasing as well; the program started with just over 20 students, and ASB now has more than 100 participants traveling to seven different places on the East Coast.

"This is one of the most self-empowering classes that I've ever taken. It teaches one to be involved in their own education, and I think that the opportunity to work with faculty and community organizations while being a student helps to advance cross-cultural understanding," Sibley-Schwartz said, ironically noting later that part of this growth is students learning about all of "red-tape at UMass."

For Arthur Keene, the professor who helped to start Alternative Spring Break at UMass, he feels that as he has withdrawn from the teaching aspect of the classes themselves, his role subsequently evolved.

"We're trying to create a partnership between the faculty, community and students and that means rethinking the roles we play," he said. "I have students reworking the syllabus for next semester's course. They have readings suggested and I think it's a good thing that they are taking over things that I've done previously. Students are showing leadership," Keene said, echoing Sibley-Schwartz's sentiments.

To some extent though, all of the campus planning and leadership takes a back seat to actually being in these various communities.

The Actual Event

But all the classroom learning in the world isn't preparation enough for the rural poverty that students encounter over their Spring Break. Students in the different classes went to very different communities last year and will expand on those communities this year. The students from the Grassroots Community Development class, Keene charges, went to Westmoreland and Caroline counties, as well as Ivanhoe and New Road Virginia. Students in the Inter-Religious Project went to the Carolinas and Alabama.

Sibley-Schwartz thinks that the experience itself, the initial exposure to dire rural poverty, depends totally on people's exposure to culture. "Socio-economic class is totally different than it is here, but we usually take a pretty diverse groups of students down there," he said.

Sibley-Schwartz conceded that the people seen by UMass students are very different.

"There is a fine line between education...," Sibley-Schwartz trailed off, clarifying by saying, "We try to educate everyone through different theories and books as well communication by people in the program, different trainings, exercises, makes people more aware of different scenarios that will be played out in those communities."

Those scenarios, though, aren't one-sided. The communities themselves and the organizations already in place to help the people also play an active role. Mary Ware, the Executive Director of the Quin Rivers Agency for Community Action in Charles City, Virginia, helps the UMass students that come to Caroline County.

Her organization serves five rural counties, helping to coordinate Headstart, family violence and sexual assault counseling, housing, transportation, water and waste water facilities, emergency food and fuel.

With a sort of laugh, she summed up her job of five years as being one of providing "multi-purpose human services."

Ware's experience with ASB extends beyond the Amherst campus. Western Michigan and Pittsburgh's Carlowe College had been in Caroline County prior to UMass. Guessous and UMass first arrived there last year, but entered a county ready to handle the U's interested group of students.

"This is a community based program, so before the students come down, we bring together key players in the community, including ourselves, churches and other social service organization together. We put our heads together about once a week and determine what can be done," Ware said.

She said that the students from UMass did many of the rehabilitation projects, but also that students brought something more with them: community curiosity.

"They have a different tack, they always want a lot more information about the community. This is course work for them, so their perspective is slightly different. They're a very independent group, which is good," Ware said.

She said that some students aren't prepared and end up spending half of their time reacting with horror to the conditions surrounding them.

"Rural poverty isn't pretty," Ware succinctly summed up. "They study some of our issues, they want information before they come down and they then pass on that information to the next crop of students."

Ware was excited and grateful for the opportunity to praise the students. She spoke highly of the work that they do.

The End Result

Everybody interviewed for this story spoke in glowing terms about their experience, be it Ware, who described "a wonderful group of students," or Keene, who said that the Alternative Spring Break was the "most exciting teaching [he's] done in 22 years of college."

Ware, for her part, didn't just mention her own pleasure, but that part of their work was helping to bring her communities together. It was almost as if she wanted to reassure an enthusiastic and eager group of students that the work they were doing was having some sort of longer-term impact.

"They come down here and offer a different perspective on the community. People come together down here for that week to work together; churches that don't normally interact with one another will do so when these kids are down here," she said. "They are accomplishing more than just the concrete work that is getting done."

Furthermore, she reported little trouble when it came to dealing with community members who might not want outsiders to get involved in what they might consider a very internalized condition. Rural poverty, especially in the regularly disrespected Appalachian region, can bring out the most insular qualities of its people, but UMass has apparently, or at least mostly, transcended that.

Higgins, whose United Christian Foundation has been involved in the Alternative Spring Break since its inception, and perhaps before it, takes great pleasure from the sheer creativity of the program.

"What excites me is that this is such an unorthodox way of getting a liberal arts or University education," Higgins said, making perhaps the most cogent point about the program.

So much education is classroom-based, making it difficult to immediately apply in any sort of "real-life" setting. The Alternative Spring Break forces students into the cold, so to speak. As Ware said, rural poverty really isn't easy. But as Sibley-Schwartz put it that was the point.

"Seeing it absolutely legitimizes it. Without any sort of education, it just ends up with us helping them," he said. "When we offer avenues for people to relate to what they see, it makes it a much more holistic learning experience."

Expansion?

Because of the relative popularity of the program (a 500 percent increase in student participation over four years), ASB is continually expanding. Next year, students will travel to seven different locations, including a shift away from coastal states to Tennessee, and another weekend-only program closer to home in Holyoke. Students are establishing Reverse-Spring Breaks (bringing kids from these communities to UMass), as well developing a summer camp for students.

Higgins brought professors from the School of Management into the ASB. This is considered unusual because SOM wouldn't be necessarily be thought of as a breeding ground for rural community development, but Higgins reported otherwise, saying he couldn't accommodate the sheer numbers of interested professors from SOM, turning away somewhere between five and nine. Headed to South Carolina's Sea Islands, professors will work on issues of grassroots economic development, corporate responsibility and the ASB staples: teamwork and leadership.

The impact of the ASB is in the little things as near as anyone can tell: Megan McGrory getting a chance to be a leader as a sophomore, Mary Ware being proud of students who can bring people together who so often are apart, students like Guessous and Sibley-Schwartz who stay at UMass to continue to develop these projects. A program like the ASB won't change the world today, and that's OK. Grassroots change never does; it builds on the little things that were just mentioned and makes very pragmatic, very gradual changes over the course of time.

With that process begun, the sun has only begun to rise on the possibilities of the ASB, and so as long as some students choose to participate instead of going to Jamaica or Cancun, UMass will stay the barrier between Amherst and the real world. That's a better scenario than UMass being the real world and Cancun being the escape.

UM Prof. nominated for Fulbright

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Professor Anna Nagurney got an early holiday gift this year.

The University of Innsbruck, Austria, has nominated Nagurney for a Fulbright Distinguished Chair. There are 34 distinguished faculty chairs.

Nagurney, a Finance and Operations Management professor at the Isenberg School of Management, will teach three advanced undergraduate courses on globalization.

"It's a dream come true," Nagurney said. "I was thrilled."

The three courses she will teach at the new business school at the University of Innsbruck focus on globalization and its effects on various financial aspects. The topics will include finance and globalization, network economics and transportation.

Congratulatory letters have been coming in all week.

"Senator Stan Rosenberg sent me a letter," Nagurney said. "I'm getting emails from students from over a decade ago. It is really cool."

Nagurney is no stranger to international acclaim. She has been a visiting professor to the Royal Institute of Technology in Sweden twice, and won the International Kempe Prize in honor of Thord Palander at Umea University, Sweden, in 1986. She has taught in Switzerland, Russia, Greece and Canada.

"I had to turn down the Italians," she said. "They weren't happy about that."

This will be Nagurney's third trip to Austria. She will leave in March 2002 and return in June.

She has also lectured at Brown University, Clemson University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. While other universities would love to have her, Nagurney wouldn't think of leaving for good.

"The University of Massachusetts gives me the freedom to be creative, and take these kinds of leave. My research is pure passion and love. I love solving problems, and the world is so interesting right now," Nagurney said.

Her students deserve some of the credit for Nagurney's accolades.

"I love the students. They are fantastic," Nagurney said. "I am convinced that the three National Science Foundation grants I received were based on my students saying 'hey professor, wouldn't it be interesting to look at networking and transportation, or satellite communication.' I wrote the proposals, and got the grants."

would not be laughed in the face by a judge," Eltringham said. "I have personally been reviewing the case and the possibilities of illegalities which may have taken place."

The Executive Board has taken rumors of a possible civil suit lightly, as SGA President Jeff Howe explained that no one's rights to due process were violated in this case.

"No one's rights to due process were violated and if someone wants to sue the SGA they would have to say that these elections were constitutional, and no one can say that these elections were constitutional," Howe said. "I don't think they will get away with this."

However, others begged to differ when asked about the constitutionality of the elections.

Chair of University Policy Michael Whitehouse explained that he felt there were two direct violations in relationship to the due process of the case.

"Jim [Eltringham] was not provided with the petitioners case before hand; therefore, most of the evidence provided was a surprise," Whitehouse said. "He was not able to properly respond to the accusations against him. Secondly, the Area Governments and anyone else named in the case did not have the opportunity to testify or defend themselves. They did not have the opportunity to defend themselves, yet they were still prosecuted and that's illegal and a violation of due process."

Along with the rumors of legal actions, rumors surrounding a "Shadow Government" have arisen. There have been various allusions to the make up of this shadow government and questions about whether it even really exists.

"The shadow government is basically some people, mostly chairs of committees, getting together and taking this opportunity to rise above the ashes as a better SGA," Whitehouse said.

Whitehouse explained that most of what has been talked about has been done on a one on one basis, however they will be meeting tonight at 7 p.m. to discuss issues surrounding the student body.

"We're going to go through the Constitution and by-laws and look at the structure of the government," Whitehouse said. "We're acting as a government when we're an advocacy for the student body. We look at the system as a checks and balance system when we don't need to because we don't have the power of that type of system."

Other issues surrounding the idea of a shadow government would be the lack of senators involved in the processes of the SGA. Whitehouse explained that they are hoping to be viewed as a new SGA, one with a new attitude and seen as productive rather than just about internal politics.

"Whether we revamp or throw out the SGA, we're still the same people working for the SGA and the students," Whitehouse said. "We want this to be a rebirth of the SGA and a way for us to shed our skin."

Howe's opinions on even the possibility of a shadow government were simple: he stated that the SGA will always be recognized as the SGA by the administration as well as the student body.

Some senators approached the decision pragmatically, saying that it was time for the SGA to move past the weeks of soulful infighting.

"All the damage has been done and we need to begin next semester with a fresh start," Tom Henner, the Chair of Public Policy and Relations, said.

that I had bought for $70 and I think I got maybe $15."

Nelson said that he was not the only person conscious of the situation. When asked if he had bought or sold books to students on campus, he responded by stating, "Yes," but continued to say that he had no plans to continue this business in the future.

"I don't think that many have the incentive to buy books outside of the Annex. It's just something to deter them away from it," Nelson said. "The books we buy are our property and we have the right to choose what we want to do with them."

The issue at hand, which Lee expressed concern over, was students selling books to other students and misquoting the actual prices offered.

"We don't set prices on any of our books because they are all very based upon whether the book is on order, its condition, whether it's a new addition, so there are many dependent factors to be dealt with," Lee said.

Other questions have arisen in regard to the pricing of these books. These questions stem from the fact that the Textbook Annex and the Campus Store are no longer University-owned businesses.

"There will not be any changes in the prices of our books. Textbooks in particular can be costly and students realize they are spending that money as an investment into their education," Store Director Phill Olson said. "Our goal is to make each student's shopping experience as pleasant as possible."

The Textbook Annex is made up of a staff of undergraduate, graduate and alumni students from the University. Lee expressed that by being made up of alumni they have the knowledge of what the real policies of the Textbook Annex are.

"Nine out of eleven staff members are undergraduate, graduate and alumni students," Lee said. "We know the value of the books students buy and what kind of investment they are. We wouldn't quote prices due to the many variabilities."

Aside from dealing with the up-and-coming textbook buyback season, other changes are being looked into within the Textbook Annex. Olson explained that they are working to continue to keep decreasing the amount of time that students have to wait in line to purchase their books.

"Over the summer, we will begin remodeling the building. One of the biggest things I think that students will notice will be that the traffic flow will be shifting," Olson said. "We're also going to be updating the technology by putting in a new computer system, so that should help increase the speed of things as well."

Olson also spoke about the store putting more effort into advertising with students on campus. They will, for instance, be holding a customer appreciation day in which they will be having a holiday sale for students and staff. Other events that will be taking place before the end of the semester is Frugal Friday, where if one book is bought, the next book purchased with the same or less value is 50 percent off.

"Our goal is improve the overall experience that students have when shopping in our store," Olson said. "We just want to continue to fulfill the needs of this campus and fine-tune our system even more."

Charity: 'Tis the Season

BRYAN MCALLISTER

The Holiday season is one typically thought of for its giving nature. We give gifts to children, loved ones, friends and, in some cases, even pets. We enjoy the feeling of seeing people react when receiving the gift that they had been longing for. We enjoy the feeling of giving to others.

Unfortunately, there are many people who will not be able to share that same feeling. There are people who are not hoping to receive their favorite gift, but who are hoping to have the money to feed their families or heat their homes until the end of the month. Sadly, the ones hit hardest by these types of situations during the holidays are the children. A child's most precious commodity is his or her innocence, and the holiday season is a festival of innocence with all of its traditions and beliefs. But there is a villain even more evil than the Grinch lurking during this holiday season. The villain is poverty.

As of 1996, there were 5.3 million children under the age of six living under the poverty level in the US. That is a stunning 22.7 percent of the child population of the United States.

Usually gift giving over the holidays does not include the types of things considered necessities. We give gifts that people want, what they ask for. The gifts are luxuries. We feel good after giving a child the toy they have pined for, the whole holiday season, but imagine the feeling you would have if you were able to help someone else survive.

Even giving people the necessities that they need can bring joy to a little girl or boy goes a long way. Happy Holidays.

"Who cares?" you might be asking. Unfortunately, most of us have no knowledge of Scotland, no personal ties to the country. Most of our knowledge comes from Braveheart. We know Loch Ness is there, and that they wear kilts and play bagpipes and have weird moon-man accents. From studying abroad there last year, however, I came to learn that Scotland is inevitably much more than all this tourist crap (official terminology).

Scotland is a small country, and it seems to be looked upon by the British and the rest of the world as kind of a circus act – not a real country, but just a strange land of kilts and bagpipes and nice scenery. Repeatedly, in movies and TV shows (most recently, The World is Not Enought), Scotland is shown in little five minute snippets that walk the line between affection and parody. Celebrities and others seem to have this idea that Scotland is only used for show – "Oh, and I have a castle in Scotland!" they'll say, and whisk their private jet there for a week of good golf, forgetting to explore the real culture. Forgetting to walk around all the winding streets of Edinburgh, the beautiful capital. Forgetting to stop in a pub and really listen to the conversation. Forgetting to visit all of the Highlands and see the hidden, wild beauty that doesn't quite make the postcards.

Of course, Scotland needs the tourism as well. When Braveheart was released a couple of years ago, it created a frenzy of interest in the country as they had never seen before. This was good tourism – people were genuinely interested in the history and character of the nation that was hinted at in the film.

But recently, an economic director in the Highlands commented, "The Madonna factor will hopefully emulate what Rob Roy and Mel Gibson did for Stirling and the Braveheart country in the central belt."

What??

Yes, Braveheart was a Hollywood film, but at least Gibson brought to it a deep sense of history, tradition, education and culture. What does Madonna bring to Scotland?

It certainly doesn't need overblown Hollywood fakeness, particularly in the Highland region, which could easily be horribly corrupted by any further human development whatsoever. And that's just what this Madonna thing is about. I can just imagine Madonna wearing a nice tartan dress at her reception, saying how beautiful Scotland is and how "She'd love to write a song about it." Next thing you know, "Vogue to Bagpipes" will be her next CD.

Big-bad Hollywood has already started to corrupt it in fact. When Madonna announced her wedding, the board of directors at the wedding chapel at Skibo Castle in Dornoch put up a sign announcing the upcoming weddings. Madonna's was fourth and last on the list. But one of the others on the list was the marriage of Jane Tooze and Andrew Davies, two shy lovers who planned to wed secretly and quietly on Christmas Eve, and then tell their family about it.

Oops, so much for that plan. The wedding announcement was photographed and now, everyone in the world knows.

It must be wonderful to have that kind of power. To just announce that you're getting married, and suddenly you seem to own an entire country. If Scotland is smart enough, however – and they are – they won't buy into this too much; they won't have Madonna monuments all over the Highlands and give out Madonna Highland toffee at museum gift shops. Only we would expect that. I can't even begin to express the beauty and complexity of Scotland in an editorial column, but I wanted to express the simple concern of not being fooled when you read about this wedding or see it televised on TV. I'm sure NBC or at least the E! Channel are already planning on their coverage. They'll show you a few nice postcard-pictures of the Highlands and maybe show a little five-minute segment on Scottish culture, which will inevitably include both kilts and bagpipes.

Naturally, what you will see tells much more about American culture than Scottish.

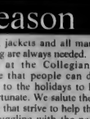
Bad Test



DAN LAMOTHE

All right, I've got something to get off of my chest. All of this nonsense with the MCAS program has got to stop. Just when I thought I was free and clear of it for the most part, here it is, getting shoved down my throat again.

You see, for those of you who didn't know, at our wonderful state government is strongly considering adding an MCAS-type test that everyone in each of the 28 Massachusetts schools to higher public education (with that one check will have to take before we graduate.

Is it me, or does the entire planet except for the three people making MCAS questions think that this test is a total waste of time? Every student I talk to, every teacher and professor that has made mention of the test thinks that it is pointless. A waste. And damn it all, they're right!

All that the MCAS has done on the high school and middle school level is make our schools and teachers teach students what is on the test instead of teaching what is important to our future. By now, we've all noticed the kinds of problems that occur when one system takes a standardized test. Many of our younger brothers and sisters are being tested on information that they've never learned, and if they don't pass the test, they may never get out of high school (so I exaggerate a little, sue me).

Last Friday, Lieutenant Governor Swift made a trip to Western Massachusetts. Among other things, she made a trip to my hometown to field questions from students at my alma mater, Chicopee Comprehensive High School. Let me tell you guys, she's not one pearls of wisdom in her Ivory Tower shocked.

Swift doesn't seem to think that it is a problem if students have to spend an extra year in high school prepping to pass the MCAS test. She also thinks that the MCAS has done a world of good, which shows exactly how much she's involved with the whole situation.

Among other things, a fair majority of the interview was based on the MCAS. One student (a senior who doesn't have to take the test again) asked Swift if she would come back to take the test in the spring with him and the other students, to prove that the test is indeed fair and passable. After all, if our very own Lieutenant Governor can't pass the test, how fair can it be to the average student? "I'm not into that sort of thing," Swift replied.

It gets worse. When the students responded with concern that taking remedial courses so that they could pass the test would take away from their normal college prep education, Swift responded, "There's always the five-year plan." Right, I'm sure that will help, too. Everyone loves that idea! Everyone can be 23 when the graduate from high school, and get their bachelor's degree when they're 30 from college. After all, we've got to prove we really earned it.

The logic behind the MCAS is harmless enough, but the system that was put into place has grown out of control. It's a monster. There is no way you can convince me that there is only one quarter of the kids in Massachusetts know enough basic skills to be considered "proficient" in the English language, but that's what the MCAS would like you to believe. In fact, according to the 1999 MCAS results, zero percent of Massachusetts students are bright enough to be considered "advanced" in English. Yep, zero percent. Do they really mean to tell us that there isn't a single kid in the entire state that is gifted? That's pathetic.

I guess I see a problem when I know a student that can break 1500 on the SAT's, but not rate as advanced on the MCAS testing. Exactly what kind of student does it take to reach the mark?

Let's make this clear: the MCAS has been nothing short of chaos at the high school level. Moving it up to the university level would be nothing short of asinine. Think about it: if the "experts" have been able to come up with a fair and equitable system for high school students that supposedly are all supposed to be learning the same basic information, how are they going to come up with one for the students at this and all of the other universities, colleges and community colleges in the state of Massachusetts?

With all of the different majors and different schools, there would be hundreds of tests to take! Not to mention, what kind of MCAS test do you give a B.D.I.C. student? Perhaps they would just make up another test for the average Frisbee physics major. I don't know.

The bottom line is that you can't take a horribly skewed system and apply it to new places without expecting bad results in the end. Hopefully, our leaders realized this before it is too late.

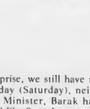
Heartworm

Mob or Demagogue?



SIMON PONGRATZ

Surprise, we still have no president. But as of yesterday (Saturday), neither did Israel have a Prime Minister, Barak having quit. In fact, it seemed like Saturday was the day for bad news. As if the two headlines above weren't enough, the economic news is bad as well – an increase in the unemployment rate to 4.1 percent and a 40 percent chance of a recession next year.

The idea that Benjamin Netanyahu will run for PM in Israel is frightening. He's running on the promise to "restore security for Israeli citizens," which really means that peace is all but dead, and that the garrison state will remain. Barak's resignation might be a way to block Netanyahu from running, but the Likud party has "vowed to find a way that would allow him [Netanyahu] to run." The unofficial polls have the former PM way ahead of Barak and the other possible candidate Ariel Sharon, giving him the highest odds of success. Then, there will be even fewer chances of peace.

I used to love that C-Span program, where people call in and tell the viewers what they're thinking, but I just can't stomach it anymore. Anyone looking for evidence as to just how effective the media is at disseminating disinformation should look no further. The Gore voters especially have the most warped sense of reality I've ever heard. They call and rant about Bush trying to disenfranchise voters, and subverting the election process through the courts. Where do they get this nonsense? It was Gore's people who sent a memo throughout Florida on how to disqualify military votes, who first took to the courts to challenge the election, who tried to throw out 25,000 ballots in Seminole County. These facts they conveniently ignore.

At the risk of being hypocritical, I praise the Florida court's decision to not throw out the latter 25,000 votes. Gore wants to count dimpled chads, hanging chads, scratched chads, and people named Chad. However, 25,000 votes in which the intent of the voter is clear must be thrown out? Nonsense.

I remember an old HBO original movie called The Late Shift, which was the story of the behind the scenes intrigues swirling around the choice for Johnny Carson's successor on the "Tonight Show."

Of course Jay Leno won, but if the movie is to be believed, some time after NBC chose Leno, they went and offered the show to Letterman, at which point his agent advised him not to accept. When asked why, he explained that he would be getting used goods – not the Johnny Carson show, but the Jay Leno show. I wouldn't blame Bush or Gore (whomever has the better lawyers) for declining the Presidency for the same reason. In today's world, when the president is a mindless cue card reader and never someone of substance – no, that would be dangerous – the analogy works well. Perhaps Letterman should run.

The next four years (or less) are probably going to suck no matter who becomes president. The Democrats, understanding that they won't win but determined to fight along with their alpha male leader, have sworn a Russian style scorched earth policy that would make it difficult for Washington, much less Bush, to govern. Meanwhile, Hillary sits enthroned in the Senate, plotting the coup. I think, nay, I know that she will run for President in 2004, and as she is much, much smarter that Gore, she'll probably win (an unofficial poll has 47% of Americans "considering" voting for her if she were to run). That frightens me; for I can just imagine being entertained by her on the boob tube while the behavior police come to the door to take "dissidents" to the gulag. With hard times almost certainly on the horizon, we must be vigilant against a demagogue. The ability of a person to snatch the reins of power for the purpose of accomplishing evil deeds in a country – which seems to have a strong tradition of civility and justice – should not be underestimated. Would anyone have believed, in 1933, that Germany was headed down the dark road along which the Nazi's led it (although a reading of Mein Kampf should have made Hitler's intentions quite obvious)? In '33, Hitler was mocked in Germany and the world, but no one was laughing in 1945.

In the same respect, James Hamilton Lewis, writing about the end of the Roman Republic and the beginning of empire, said, "It should have been evident to anyone who could read the signs of the future that the power possessed for a time by the Senatorial oligarchy would soon be snatched from it, either by the frenzied hand of a mob or the strong hand of a despot."

Well, in 1991, when the US was in a recession of its own (curiously, also the date of that great war to rejuvenate the public's desire for foreign adventures, the Gulf War), signs proclaiming "buy only American made," were popping up everywhere, which is really only one step away from "kauft nicht bei Juden." We're not invulnerable to this kind of fanaticism. I would argue that we are even more inclined to it – and so we must be on guard.

Hitler's greatest triumph was controlling the people as no one had done before. He made the entire nation – a nation that was for centuries regarded as the most civilized and cultured, the epitome of what European civilization should be – accomplices in their own eyes and those of the world. But everyday Germans were just as guilty as everyday Americans were in the treatment (such an insufficient word) of the Native Americans, Japanese, and African Americans, Americans love (read: need) an enemy, and both foreign and domestic conflict is in the interest of those who make policy. So it is up to us to avoid that, to know better.

Alas, all the trends show otherwise. The media remains able to manipulate opinion to its own ends, and history is dying as a discipline. Thus step one (forgetting) is under way. How far we will progress into step two (repeating) remains to be seen.

And on a lighter note, I'd like to thank the Collegian for this forum and extend best wishes to all of UMass on their finals, papers, presentations, etc. Happy Holidays as we'll see you next semester.

Information from Investors Business Daily, Independent News, The German Century, and The Two Great Republics: Rome and the United States was used in this article.

RYAN BENHARRIS

I swore that I wouldn't do this, but I simply can't help it. To those of you who have been called "random columns" as they have been called and hated every one of them, I sincerely apologize. But, in the tradition of Jaret Barr, it's my turn!

Random columns are nothing more than early versions of "Notes from the Campus Center basement."

Don't ever bet on me to hook up with anyone when I'm drunk. Not only will you lose money, but I'll end up going out of my way to make sure that you feel bad for doing it. Plus I would never be that discourteous to any woman, especially someone who deserves so much more respect than that. I hate to break the news to you guys, but even as a hammered idiot, I still don't have it in me to be sleaze. There was a reason why I wanted nothing to do with your horrible gambling game. Gentlemen, you should be ashamed of yourselves.

The two coolest women I know are both going to England next semester.

Half priced apps has become politically outrageous.

There is a quote from these random columns that seems to have the same effect as "Yippee-cayee," in the Die Hard movies.

I'm beginning to wonder why every time I go somewhere and the DJ plays and Eminem song, someone yells, "Where's Benharris," and pulls me towards the floor. Maybe I'm developing a known obsession...P.S. We should be together too!

On December 25th I'll be where every Jewish person in the country is - a movie theater. As Kyle said on "South Park," "I'm a Jew. A lonely Jew, on Christmas."

Limp Bizkit is the greatest music of this generation.

Tomorrow will be my last day as the Arts & Living editor. I'll go the way of Bryan, Adam and Seema. Remember Seema?

Katie Holmes is gorgeous, but calling her a national treasure may be a bit much.

High Fidelity is the best movie of the year.

Big, tall and loud doesn't make a person mean or bad. The nicest person I know is big, tall, loud and pissed off all the time.

Ann-Marie told me to make something up about her and write a column about that. I won't write anything, but you should call her and ask her why she thinks, "Red meat will kill you."

No one is stalking me anymore.

Skiers dressed in Santa costumes flew down a hill earlier this week in Maine. I would never do that. You couldn't catch me dead wearing skis.

Whether Bush or Gore wins is not that big of a deal. People are overlooking the important part of this election. Nader beat Buchanan.

Anyone want to buy pictures of Kurt Cobain, Mariah Carey or the Beatles? I think people sell them on eBay now.

I wonder if Eminem is buying a Christmas present for his mom.

Ryan in September, "You've got to love those GPA Boosters. Nutrition 130 and Music 160 here I come!"

I was the biggest loser in high school. When I got to college I decided to do absolutely everything I could to make everyone know who I was. I've worked several jobs, did lots of volunteer service and participated in many extra activities. When all that didn't work, and people still didn't like me, I lost thirty pounds.

Creed's album Human Clay has turned them into everything Pearl Jam hates.

Cheryl, now I have to go all the way to Florida to visit you? Well, maybe I'll join a sports team, and we'll travel there. You can come watch.

All fighting should be solved in a steel cage wrestling match on pay-per-view. I really don't care about politics, but Bush and Gore, beating the crap out of each other; I'll pay $49.95 for it!

If anything makes me famous, it will definitely be "Third and 48." When it does make me a millionaire, I'm going to donate all of the money to charity. I'll call it the Eric Soderstrom House, and it will be used to start leagues of disregarded sports involving fowl, like turkey shooting and ostrich racing.

My prediction for The Grinch was $500 Million. That's just a shade over what Alex Rodriguez will end up making.

I can't believe that someone printed that I am, the Lyon Renharris. For crying out loud, don't give Batman away as Bruce Wayne!

Barenaked Ladies are coming to the Mullins Center. Tickets are $37.50. Strip-clubs wouldn't dare charge that much for admission. Plus they serve beer.

I'm failing Nutrition 130. I'm getting a D in Music 160.

Pearl Jam's new album Binaural has turned Creed into the best alternative rock act out there.

Maybe my bitterness toward the holiday season stems from the time when my parents told me that Santa is dead. They claim the Easter Bunny poisoned him with chocolate. Of course, the worst was when they said the Tooth Fairy committed suicide. I think my parents were just cheap.

Ieret, sorry to break the news to you, but there is only one Asif Sayani, and he is the f—king man!

VH1 has become almost as crappy as MTV. Next week's "Behind the Music," The Bacon Brothers. I heard they'll be using strategically placed "Pop-up Video" logos over the shot in Wild Things where we see Kevin's bacon.

Hank Azaria took over Robert Downy Jr.'s role in whatever atrocious movie he was filming. Azaria is funnier than Downy, and he's not on crack.

I was looking for our Creed file photo the other day. Apparently some fifteen-year old kid in Los Angeles paid hard earned "drinking money" for it.

The Grandma with the birthday present" line in Cruel Intentions is the worst screenwriting I have ever seen in my life. It would have been funny if they had Ernest say it though.

I don't look like a couch.

I think Regis and Kathy Lee should trade jobs. She should host "Millionaire," and he should be a sweatshop leading anti-Christ.

There is nothing I fear more than Rob delivering "the message." Note to self: never ever piss off Rob!

Someone out there buy me a Christmas present. Just so I can feel included!

To all of you washed-up hacks that have tried before me, smile, nod and show acceptance for Ryan Benharris as the new master of the random column. Because we all know, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian: tough place to play!

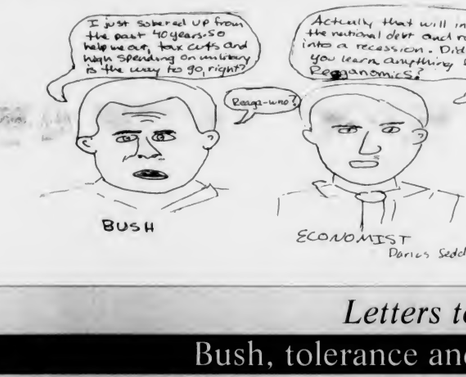
Dorms



I just sobered up from the past 10 years so help me out, how cuts and high spending on military is the way to go, right?
Actually that will increase the national debt and run us into a recession. Did'nt you learn anything from Reaganomics?
Reagan-omics
BUSH
ECONOMIST
Dennis Seddon

"The dorms." Many times, especially over the last few weeks, I have heard this phrase said in disgust and frustration by many UMass students. It seems that, as I am finishing with half of my sophomore year, that more and more of my friends are longing to move off-campus, to an apartment or house in or around Amherst.

Well, I never thought I'd do this, but I am actually writing this column in defense of the dorms. In fact, I am voluntarily going to live in the dorms next semester, even though I have enough credits to technically "become" a junior and move off-campus if I wish to do so. Quite simply, though, I think there are many major advantages to living on-campus here at UMass.

JEANNE GORBOLOVSKY

The first major advantage of the dorms is their convenience. "Location, location, location" is the key word here. Admittedly, not all of the dorms are conveniently located. I lived in Carice last year, which is one of the southern-most dorms in Southwest, and I had to take quite a long hike to get to most of my classes on campus. However, even someone living on Orchard Hill or in Sylvan is still usually closer to classes than someone living off-campus, unless it's someone who lives somewhere very close off-campus, like frat row. It's much easier to be able to run home if you forget a book or homework for a class if you live on campus. It is nice to be able to go home to your dorm room and rest if you have a break in between classes, and many times off-campus students can't go back home because the travel time would take up the whole break. It is easier to get to classes, especially in the morning, if you live on campus and only have to walk for 10 minutes, rather than someone who lives off-campus and has to drive perhaps a significant amount of time to class. It is also much easier and more convenient to make it to evening or weekend events at UMass if you actually live on the campus.

Transportation is also a huge issue here. There is not a lot of parking at UMass, so many commuter students are forced to park far from classes and then hike to the center of campus from the parking lots. A lot of times, this walk is farther than someone in the dorms has to walk to get to class. Also, for those commuter students who don't have cars, bus transportation can be a nightmare, as evidenced by the problems the under-staffed PVTA was having at the beginning of the semester. I have friends who live off-campus and have a really hard time coming to evening or weekend events on campus because of the wacky bus schedule.

Another advantage of living on campus is being able to have less responsibility than people who live "on their own" off-campus. I don't want to think about the days where I'll have to graduate from UMass, get a job and pay for my own apartment, bills and food. Why would I want to take all this "adult" responsibility on now? College is a time for studying, but also for enjoying life before you have to become an adult with bills and economic responsibilities. (I know that some people work their way through college, but most who are paying for their own education have loans that they don't have to pay off until they graduate, so they are technically bill-free for now.) Even though some people pay for their own room and board, just like some people pay for their own apartments, it's easier to have everything taken care of at the beginning of the semester so you are guaranteed food and shelter for the next few months. The thought of living off-campus and not having enough monies to pay for rent during a certain month, or not having enough money for food, is really scary to me. Besides, I am too busy with schoolwork to clean an apartment and cook for myself every day. For right now, I am happy living in my dorm room and eating the DC food (no matter how horrible it can get. I don't have to cook it on my own, so I try not to complain too much).

But the best part of living in the dorms, to me, are the great people you get to meet. I would not have met many of my best friends if I had not lived in the dorms. The dorms are an instant social network. It can be hard to be lonely in a dorm when there are so many people around and many things are going on. All dorms have interesting programs that are entertaining and a good way to meet new people. So many times in the dorms, I have had really great conversations with people in my dorm that I met in the hallway or the lounge. Many of those people have since become friends. Many times in a dorm setting, it is possible to engage in a seemingly random conversation with a stranger or a neighbor that educates you and completely opens your eyes to a new idea or point of view. Often, this is something you wouldn't learn in an academic setting. Also, it is really good to live in a dorm because you learn to live with and get along with different types of people. This is a very valuable skill for later on in life. Living in the dorms I have probably gotten more of an education, and more great life experience, than I ever will in the UMass classroom.

There are admittedly many problems in the dorms. Sometimes it can get too noisy and too dirty. I know first-hand how annoying it can be when you can't study or sleep because there are people making a huge ruckus outside your door. I also hate having to share a bathroom with dozens of other girls on my floor. It's annoying to have to wake up in the middle of the night and have to walk through a long hallway, and a lounge to be able to go to the bathroom. Also, there are many rules in the dorms, and it can be annoying to have the threat of being written up hanging over your head. However, a lot of times people's problems with the dorm lifestyle can be solved if they get a different roommate, or if they move to a different dorm that is more compatible to their personality. For example, someone who lives on a noisy floor in John Adams and hates the dorms because of the noise might be a lot better off on a quiet floor in Crabtree, and might actually like living in that dorm. And many times, people who talk about wanting to move off-campus don't realize the many new responsibilities they will face, such as having to possibly sublet their apartment for the summer and dealing with difficult landlords.

Now, I'm not saying that I never want to move off-campus. I think people often outgrow the dorms by the time they've been at UMass for two or three years, and the same will probably happen to me. However, I also think there are many benefits to living to the dorms. And, if you are like some of my friends who weren't able to find off-campus housing for next semester and are now going to have to live in the dorms again, realize that your situation is not so bad and stop bashing the dorms.

By the way, I also want to wish everyone good luck with finals and a very very happy Winter break! Go out and do something wonderful, so you can come back next semester refreshed and ready to face classes (and perhaps life in the dorms!) yet again.

Letters to the editor

Bush, tolerance and coal in our stocking

To the editor:

It now appears that a Constitutional crisis has been narrowly averted. George W. Bush, the self-proclaimed ultimate Washington outsider - never mind that he is the son of a U.S. president and grandson of a U.S. Senator - appears ready to be coronated. Long live the King of the powerful and monied interests!

For a little while, it seemed that the state of Florida was going to try to count as many legitimate votes as was possible, but then "W" (that's "W" for "Washington," folks) got the ultimate D.C. powerbrokers to weigh in on his side. Those August, righteous Republican robes from the land's highest court decided that enough was enough. Then had to stop the activity precipitated by the latest ruling of Florida's supreme legal authority - because if enough undervotes from all over Florida were added to the vote totals, there was a chance that Texas' current chief executioner would end up losing not only the Nation's vote, but also the vote tally of his little brother Jeb's bastion - and oh, what a chilly Christmas feast that would make.

But we should be thankful. As James Baker, Tom DeLay and a host of other Republican arbiters have repeatedly told us, the Democrats were in the process of stealing the election! I mean, really, W. had assured us that brother Jeb was going to deliver Florida for him even before the election results were counted - how dare the Democrats try to find out what actually happened! Why can't they accept the moral superiority of W. and his cronies? Don't they know that Albert Gore was going to do his level best to aid the neediest Americans? Why, they are the ones committing the crimes in this country! If we let W. make sure that most of America's tax resources went to preserve the property of the rich and the few, we could then build enough prisons to house all those Democratic "robbers" - or better yet, why not save those resources and justly execute them?

Seriously, folks - let us consider this bald-faced lie, that the Democrats, by their incessant whining for recount after recount, were trying to fleece Bush and his Republican support of their rightful, righteous victory. Is it the Democrats who are invoking the federal watchdogs to stop a state court from invoking their state right to count ballots as they deem proper? If there is one truth in this whole mess, it is that if ALL the people in Florida who tried to vote to pick a new American president actually had their choices tabulated, right now president-elect Albert Gore would be in Washington choosing potential cabinet members, not preparing to return to Tennessee.

We know that something is seriously wrong with our whole national election apparatus - never mind the thorny question of what to do about our anachronistic system of choosing our national CEO through the votes of a relative handful of political operatives anointed to cast electoral votes. We shouldn't be counting hanging chads- we should have a federally mandated, uniform system of electronic ballot-casting and counting, with uniform poll closing times and all absentee ballots in and counted as soon as all those polls simultaneously close. Maybe there is one legitimate notion being propounded by some of the Republican rabble - this antiquated Floridian system has made it impossible to truly, successfully count all the balloting accurately. But why the enraged exclamations of larceny? Why do we have to endure the unending smirking of those condescending conservatives who are sure they know better?

In the end, we will get a cadre of Republican drill sergeants telling us that everyone has a constitutional right to bear arms, that everyone needs tax relief, that the government that governs best spends less on programs to educate and otherwise benefit America's underclass and more to defend our nation against incipient evil empires (but forget about "nation building" - after all, what right do we have to interfere in the orderly process of systematic starvation of millions of Africans, or for that matter with attempted genocides against outnumbered, persecuted peoples?). Let us not forget that Pat Robertson, that bleeding-heart liberal champion of lost causes, declared that perhaps a moratorium on the carrying out of death sentences needed to be considered, given the growing mountain of evidence that it was being administered discriminatorily. But George W. Bush set us straight on that one - after all, in Texas not a single person has been executed unjustly. Now we, the American people, will get to experience the attempt of George W. Bush to enact a system of injustice to govern The United States at the start of the 21st century.

To the editor,

To all my beautiful black brothas and sistahs and all people of color. I would like for you to read this and think about it. I am a beautiful black woman, blessed with many things given to me through the grace of God. When people look at me they see me as a black woman, but they don't know anything about me. Some may make a pre-judgment about me based on the way my clothes look, the way my hair looks or how I talk but they still don't know me. A person may have a one-minute conversation with me, or a half hour or maybe even an hour, but they still don't know me. What is my point you ask? Well I want you to know me. I am a beautiful, black and educated woman who loves women. Now that wasn't so hard to say, than why has it taken me years to tell the black community I love so much? Why do I feel like I have to act heterosexual to have a place in the black community? I am not in any way saying that one or all of you have made me feel this way. But I haven't felt welcome. I guess the best way to handle it is to assume that everyone is heterosexual and if a person doesn't volunteer information, then we are good to go. Well, I am not good to go. I want to be accepted for all that I am: black, a woman and not heterosexual.

I did not write this to attack anyone, only to educate. I want the black community and all people of color on this campus to open their eyes and their minds and remember we all come from different backgrounds, live different lives and we all struggle. I just want us to respect one another. I did not write this as a way to come out to all of UMass, I wrote this so that we can start to remember that we need to include EVERYONE. Some of you may read this and not see the point to it, and some of you may read this and feel what I am saying. I hope all of you feel what I am saying. After you read this, I just want you to think about how many events you have attended this semester and then think about all the events you have attended since becoming part of the UMass community. How many of them have had anything to do with being black and homosexual or an event dealing with homosexual issues? How many events have you planned that dealt with homosexuality in the black community? I am black, I am a woman and I love...just maybe not the way you do...don't exclude me for it.

To the editor;

This is the 5th letter I've written in response to inaccurate reports made about me, and my record. I'll keep this one short. First, (and I know I am going to make some of you very, very happy) there is absolutely no chance I am running for reelection again. Second, you accused me of attempting to cut RSO's budgets in order to make a Spring concert happen, and then say it didn't happen that year. The Ways and Means budget that I was the chair for resulted in increases for most RSOs, only one group voicing an objection in front of the Senate. Previous to that budget there had been one Spring concert in three years. Since that budget, there has been a spring concert every year. This isn't to say I'm responsible for Spring concerts happening (it's the hard work of UPC and SGA that makes it happen), but since we made a separate Spring concert account under my watch, it's been a tradition that students can count on. Get your facts straight and try to get that yellow out of your journalism.

Seth Avakian

To the editor;

I would like to provide clarification on several issues raised by Ms. Rachel Smith in her Nov. 22 and again repeated on Dec. 6 letter to the editor concerning textbook and buyback pricing. The Annex uses industry standard pricing on all its textbooks. The primary price driver for new textbooks is the publisher's price to the retailer. The majority of the cost of a book is paid to the publishers, usually 75-80 percent. Of the remaining portion, all bookstore costs must be deducted, including such expenses as salaries and utilities.

With respect to the buyback of used textbooks, the Textbook Annex's policy is to pay 50 percent of the new book price (regardless of the price paid by the student) if the instructor has placed an order for the book for the following semester. The Annex also buys back books for which there are no orders for the following semester at a price based on what national wholesalers will pay.

The student advisory we emailed was in reference to individuals going door to door possibly misrepresenting the Annex. Over the years, the Annex has had numerous student complaints of book buyers erroneously quoting Annex buyback prices, only to find out later that the Annex would have given them more money.

Ms. Smith is correct, however, that your textbooks are your property. As the majority of the staff at the Textbook Annex are UMass undergrad and or graduate alumni, we understand the financial commitments placed on college students. Students should be aware of the value of their used textbooks before selling them to any individuals or businesses.

Arts Brief

Comedian Sinbad comes to the Mullins Center this Saturday night, Dec. 16. Opening for Sinbad will be UMass student Jacob Abernethy.

Sinbad, who claims he never tells jokes because he, "Doesn't know any," plans to bring a mix of old school comedy and a new age look to Amherst. He made his film debut in the 1991 football film, Necessary Roughness, and since then has appeared in Houseguest, First Kid and Homeward Bound II. He also starred and produced his own television show called, "The Sinbad Show."

Sinbad won the NAACP Image Award two years in a row in the "Most Outstanding Variety Series/Special" category for his 4HBO special, "Sinbad's Summer Jam."

Jake Abernathe has been juggling since he was fourteen years old. He made extra cash juggling in the streets of Boston, until he enrolled in the Faneuil Hall Street Performer's program. He recently won the Comedy Bake Off at the Fine Arts Center and was named the University's funniest student.

Tickets for Sinbad and Jacob Abernethy at the Mullins Center are $25.00 and $30.00 and can be purchased at the Mullins Center box office or online at www.ticketmaster.com.

New UVC show feeds the ducks

By Nicholas Pizzolato
Collegian Staff

Here on campus there are hundreds of different clubs that cater to student's wants and needs. As soon as one comes to the University, new tables in the Campus Center and flyers advertising one thing or another bombard students. At the risk of sounding like a school recruiter, whatever you want to do here at UMass you can find a club for it. The Ski 'N Board Club, MANA and The Hangliding Club are among a few of the hundreds of clubs on campus, all of which are student run and organized. This includes the media outlets on campus specifically UVC, the student run television station that airs original programming and productions by students on channel 19 here on campus. You may have flipped passed it trying to watch the X Games and caught a glimpse of interviews, sketch comedy or public service announcements. UVC is the ultimate place for students to air their ideas, opinions and creative talents.

Sandhill Productions is an independent production company that creates original stories and molds those stories into short films performed through marionettes. Head writer and founder of Sandhill Productions, Josh Butkiewicz, has created over 60 marionettes for this small independent production company that were molded by hand. The first two short features The Taking of Mt. Sodom and A Sandhill Revolution are based on Biblical stories that were adapted into original stories by the crew and the newest feature, Nightime in Heaven, is a totally original story thought by Mr Butkiewicz.

The ideas are processed like an actual feature film. First the ideas are processed into storyboards, then into scripts, sets are created for each story and finally they shoot each story. The films using multiple camera angles to catch the essence of the story unlike other marionette shows in which all you see is the stage. The elaborate sets, puppets and preparation that goes into these projects creates an impressive final product that can be enjoyed by any amateur filmmaker. At their website www.sandhillproductions.org, you can see photos of production, gain info about their group and past projects and you will able to see clips from past productions on the website. The films are unique and worth a gander at if you are switching through the channels.

Speaking of channel surfing, that brings me to the next show: Changing Channels, a show that, as its name suggests, switches between sketch comedy and informative pieces of news from interviewing people about the election to talking to the Stonewall Center. Created by two Communication majors Elsa Green and Eric Estremera, it focuses on mocking parts of our popular culture and educating the population of UMass with global, national and local news and opinions. Both write and produce the show equally in order to get fresh ideas and concepts in their work. They both agree that this freshness keeps viewers interested in watching the show once they've put it on. The cast for the skits is also fresh, because they run it on an open door policy, allowing people who are interested in helping them out to do so. Familiar faces in the cast include Dwayne Northe, Toni Haskins and Dominique Jackson. When I watched Changing Channels, I was amazed at how well the subject matter was covered and the transition from comedic performances to informative broadcasting. I highly recommend this show for any college student who is just channel surfing and comes across it. You can email them with comments and questions at changingchannels@hotmail.com.

Finally, one of the most original shows on any television is the UMass original feeding the Ducks created by students Scott Landes, Lee Briante, Bryce Craver, Jon Green, Skip Jones and Franko Arsenault. The best way to describe this comic show is best said by cast member Jon. "We go willy nilly all over the boob tube." The episodes have no real theme and revolve around college kids being college kids. The comedy that they perform feels as if they are speaking for the college community, joking about the status quo and pop trends (for instance, complementing each other on the new Baby Walkman). These vignettes are basically rough ideas. No scripts were used in creating the episodes, but just a general idea on what is to be done. The cast of Feeding the Ducks which met through each other, all work up ideas and share them with the group that then decides on which ideas would make the audience the most uncomfortable and hence have them continue watching to see what else the comics will do. No, they are not Tom Green or a bunch of lackass rip-offs; they are just students having fun and getting other people to live vicariously through them. But just because they don't appear on primetime television, it doesn't mean that they don't have their favorite shows. Among them are The Simpsons, The Croc Hunter, The Iron Chef and Felicity. You can meet them at www.feedingtheducks.com and learn about the show and the cast.

Anyone interested in getting a show on UVC or helping with the station should call UVC at 545-1536 or go to the UVC office next to The Hatch.

Theater Wives explore gender roles

HOUSE OF WIVES
Curtain Theater
Dec. 9

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The roles of men and women in society have been consistently questioned since nearly the beginning of time. Since gender inequality has received so much attention in the media, it would seem as if there were no new angles to explore. That is why the undertaking of House of Wives, a production put on by the UMass Department of Theater, was a brave venture.

The play, which focused on the role of women in marriage in Arab culture left the audience to feel, much like the female character in the play, both helpless at times and then eventually empowered. Overall the production was wonderful. The audience was literally transported to a household in which a woman's role was to have children and keep house, and to stray off of this path causes deep societal disapproval. Perhaps the best character within the play was the single real empowered female, Sirena, played by Cher Love Strong.

Representing a woman trying to make it working on her own in a male dominated society, Strong gave a resounding performance that reflected eerie undertones of practices held dear even today in American society. Showing both a sensitive and intuitive side to her character, she portrayed perfectly that women, even in repressive societies, are both strong and capable.

Also putting in strong performances were Rachel Edelman as Minita and Heather A. Lord as Taos. Left barren, Taos was forced to work as a slave in the home of her husband, serving another wife. Lord gave a performance that perfectly portrayed the plight of a woman who felt that she was lost. Discarded by her society, yet unable to break free of its chains, eventually she fought for her place in both her home and her world.

The entire cast put in overall, good performances. Barring the un-satisfactory ending, the entire play was overall well done. Costumes and sets were used to adequately portray the scenes, forcing the audience to do little to suspend reality. The message of the play was strong enough to leave the audience pondering the role of women in other countries and within the United States.

The return of Funkmaster

FUNKMASTER FLEX
60 Minutes of Funk - MixTape Volume IV
Loud Records

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

COURTESY BEN WATTS

Funkmaster Flex poses for his new album 60 Minutes of Funk

Funkmaster Flex, the master of the mix tape gone corporate and radio-ready, is back with his latest, 60 minutes of Funk Volume 4. The mix tape has been a fixture of underground hip-hop for years, a way for DJs to define themselves on say 60 minutes of tape or so. On his latest effort, Flex defines himself once again as a masterful mixer who combines clever cuts with tight production, the result is a solid but unspectacular album.

Flex takes the approach of the more the merrier on this album. The album packs a serious punch with 25 tracks featuring 35 different artists and 74 straight minutes of blazing hip-hop (not really 60 minutes, damn false advertising). This is actually toned down from some of his earlier efforts. (Volume 2 featured 42 tracks) With appearances by DMX, Eminem, Nelly, Ja Rule, Dr. Dre and Lil' Kim just to name a few, Volume 4 has a loaded lineup of hip hop all stars, each bringing their own lyrical flow to the table. The album basically takes the format of Flex supposedly spinning the tracks (most of which are original beats this time around as opposed to his earlier releases which featured more old school sampling) in the background while his cast of rappers do their thing on the mic.

Even with the strong cast of rappers, Flex never lets you forget that the album is about HIM. On more than a few occasions, a track is cut off in mid-stream for Flex to take the opportunity to yell at the listener and remind them that they are listening to his album, and that he is the god of all rap DJs. Flex even goes so far as to threaten other DJs. "All you punk ass niggas who try to run the club scene like the Funkster you can't, so don't try to fuckin do it, if you step on me I'll fuckin bust you." These types of comments strike as being a hollow attempt for Flex to try to gain some sort of street credibility for himself. When 2pac and Biggie threatened to bust a cap on one of their enemies, the listener could at least believe that they could actually back their words up with action if need be. For some reason, I just don't get that same feeling with Flex. And why is he so pissed at other DJ's anyway? The whole thing seems contrived and lame.

Flex's influence and power in the industry is underestimated in many circles. The friends that Flex made along the way are strongly represented on this album. With the influence of being a DJ in both New York and Los Angeles, two markets which act as trendsetters and gages for hip-hop radio throughout the country, Flex has a lot of say on what will and will not be played on the biggest hip hop stations in the two biggest media markets in the country. Because of this, it's not surprising that he is able to easily get whichever major rappers he wants for his albums (Eminem, DMX), and which rappers currently enjoying their 15 minutes of fame he wants to feature as well (Nelly). Plus he is able to gather an A-List of producers like Jermainie Dupri, Irv Gotti and DJ Premiere. Also, he is able to feature original content on his albums unlike other compilation-style albums. One would certainly think that this would result in a greatly varied sound throughout the album; however, that person would be wrong.

Despite the album's great diversity of talent, the final product is lacking in diversity of sound. Track after track sounds similar with the same scratching and cutting, and lots of rapping about "blunts, forties and bitches." Still, like any good DJ, Flex manages to keep the party humpin' the whole time through a clever mix of samples ranging anywhere from hard grinding East Coast style cuts to danceable R&B style jams to some creative sampling that stands somewhere in the middle. Funk also manages to combine the perfect background beat to compliment the persona of the rapper on the track. Whether it's the eerie, hyperactive beat for Eminems track to the more playful easy going beat for Nelly's, Funk manages to paint an accurate picture in the listener's mind that goes hand in hand with the rappers lyrics.

Overall, 60 Minutes of Funk has some excellent content. The catchy up-tempo opening track "Do You" by DMX, though not DMX at his best, will likely please the casual hip-hop fan who just wants a catchy hook and a danceable beat out of their rap. Eminem and D-12's fiery flow in "Words are Weapons" also will please these folk, as will Nelly's "Come Over," which is yet another St. Louie-style hook-happy track. There's even a track from the grave from Biggie Smalls himself, "The Wickedest," one of the album's best. Ja Rule and Jadakiss also contribute two of the albums tightest tracks in Ja's "Feelin' The Hate" and Jadakiss' "I Don't Care." Surprisingly, Busta Rhymes stands out from the all-star pack on the album in "Ante Up," a track with an infectious old school style meter that he shares with MOP, Remy Martin and Tephlon.

All in all, 60 Minutes of Funk is like most rap albums; some good, some bad, some in the middle. For the most part, Funkmaster did an admirable job on production although it sounds almost overproduced at times, especially for a mixed-tape. The album's strengths lie in simply having so many differing lyrical styles on the same record. True hip-hop fans will probably enjoy the album on that basis. 60 Minutes of Funk has one quality that most hip hop albums these days don't: it is easily listenable from beginning to end with a variety of sounds and styles that keep the album from getting stale.

Supa veteran mixer turns solo

SUPA DJ DMITRY
Scream of Consciousness
TVT

By Tom Frazer
Collegian Staff

As Bo Diddley once said "You can't judge a book by looking at its cover." The same is true for album titles. (He also said "you so ugly, you look like you've been hit with the ugly stick!"—but that is beside the point).

To start a review by discussing the failure of a musician to appropriately name his masterpiece is perhaps a little harsh, and probably superficial. It's like asking a painter to sing the critical aspects of his picture. Nevertheless, if you will cut me some slack, I will explain.

Scream of Consciousness is a terrible name. Firstly, it is an unbelievably labored wordplay, the sort of thing I might think was entertaining if English was my second language. Or even my third, behind German and French. Secondly, dance music is not predominantly characterized by emotional out-pouring. It isn't "conscious"—as I am sure millions of pill popping ravers would confest, if they weren't off their faces. And thirdly, and most importantly, Supa DJ Dmitry is not screaming. Rather he is talking. He has to talk pretty loud to be heard over the incessant house but he is talking. Scream of Consciousness is a modest album.

This is Dmitry's first solo release since the breakdown and subsequent breakup of Deee-Lite in the mid 90's. Dmitry met DJ Towa Tei (the Ying to Dmitry's Yang, if you will) at New York's Parsons School for Design. Deee-Lite were dance music superstars who went supernova and burnt out. Since then Towa has had an illustrious solo career, moving stylistically from alternative to downright freaky, but Dmitry has been quiet. To such an extent that when I asked my erstwhile dance compadre about the album, he thought I was talking about another DJ—namely Dmitri from Paris.

Dmitry obeys the recent progressive tendency of dance DJs to release mix albums containing a small selection of original tunes. Therefore any assessment of this album must be made not only on his production or creative skills, but also on his ability as a selector. Familiar, respectable names are scattered across the sleeve. The tracks also have a particularly international feel; with German, English, Italian and American tunes on show.

Dmitry's own compositions are troublesome. Of the four on the album there is an equal distribution of diarrhea to dynamite. In particular Dmitry's interpretation of the David Bowie classic "Space Oddity" is awful. Indeed that single tune enraged me so much that I almost made "bad versions of great tunes" the theme for this review—and the subsequent final synopsis would have read something like: never buy an album with songs on it that you already know, just download them from Napster. Save yourself the heartache and cash. Nevertheless, this is a noble effort from a once great mix-master.

The Collegian's own Monkey Box has released an entire book of their work. You can get more information from them at their table at the campus center. They'll be the three guys with the camera!

Pöck's addition pays dividends for UMass hockey team

By Julie Robenhymer
Collegian Staff

Most children are the recipients of their parents' hair color or body type, but Thomas Pöck was passed on something far more valuable. He was lucky enough to inherit the hockey talent of his father, Herbert, who played on many Austrian World Championship and Olympic teams, as well as the Klagenfurt (Austria) Athletic Club's senior team.

Pöck was introduced to the sport he loves at the age of two when he got his first hockey stick and then learned to skate as soon as he could run. He started playing for the KAC under-6 team at the age of four and quickly moved up the ranks.

At that time, current UMass assistant hockey coach Bill Gilligan was the head coach for the KAC senior team, where he coached Herbert for four years. Who knew that one day he would be coaching his captain's son?

"He [Thomas] used to be there all the time," Gilligan said. "He'd be like a little mouse or something. You'd have to put him in the back room to keep quiet because he was very rambunctious."

By the age of 18, Pöck had already won two World Championships with Austrian National Teams and was well on his way to a successful career in the senior leagues. That had always been his goal – to be like his father and play professionally in Austria. But earlier this year, he decided that wasn't enough.

"I always wanted to play professionally at home," said Pöck. "But last year I played in the senior league – it was good though, I learned a lot and had a lot of fun – but then I figured out that there's got to be something more."

Pöck, 19, now plays for UMass, where he is the fourth member of the European invasion and has become a central part of the team despite his rookie status. He plays with a lot of experience and has adapted well to American culture with the help of his teammates.

Earlier this year, Pöck's father called Gilligan to find out if there were any opportunities for his son. Looking back on how Herbert played, Gilligan decided that Thomas was worth a look. So, on a recruiting trip in Europe, Gilligan stopped in Austria to watch Pock in action.

"When I watched him the first time, I noticed that he is very poised with the puck," said Gilligan. "He has great patience and is very smart. He's got a good awareness of what's going on and is a strong defensive player as well."

The UMass coaching staff decided to recruit him, and in July, Pöck was added to the list of European players currently on the UMass hockey roster. Junior defenseman Toni Söderholm, who was born and raised in Finland, is one of those players.

Söderholm explains that the Junior and Senior levels of play in Europe are different from those in the United States because members of the team vary in age. They can be as young as 16 or 17 and as old as 35.

"The game back home in Juniors compared to what it is here, is more mature," he said. "So, often times you'll have guys come in more mature hockey wise and that really reflects on the way he [Pöck] plays. He's a physical guy and he's real intense. So, I think he fits in real well."

Pöck has made some adjustments to his play since coming to the United States, but he says those changes are minor. Now he is dealing with the elements of hockey that the North American style is known for – physical play and strong skating.

"College hockey is faster," he said. "I have to skate a little bit harder here than I do at home and I also have to keep my head up a little bit more, because they don't hit that much in Europe, especially the older players."

Don Cahoon, head coach of the Minutemen, explained that Pock's skills on the ice go beyond something that can be learned.

"He does a lot of things you don't teach," said Cahoon. "Just the way he reads the game and sees the plays develop. Those are things you can't teach and he does them instinctively. A player like that would be an asset to any coach's system."

Gilligan says Pöck's father had the same hockey sense.

"He was an extremely smart player, probably one of the smartest players I've ever coached and Thomas has a lot of that in him," he said.

Pöck has already made a name for himself by earning Hockey East Rookie of the Week honors just days after the start of the season.

"He's clearly defined himself as a real good young player in the league and I think you will see him continue to grow as the year goes on," said Cahoon. "He's certainly been a central part of our team's effort already and I think that will continue as long as his mindset stays the same."

Pöck's first experience with the North American style of hockey came in 1991, when his team traveled to Boston to compete in the Quincy Tournament where they lost to the Waltham Hawks. Little did he know that one day Mike Warner, then a member of the Hawks, would be his teammate at UMass.

Neither Pock nor Warner remembers much about the tournament with one exception – Warner's team won and they won by a lot.

Pock has also competed in Canada, the Netherlands, Croatia, Latvia, France and, most recently, Japan.

He describes his time with the national team as living like a professional. They went on the road for weeks at a time with nothing to do except play hockey.

"We'd get up in the morning and skate and eat lunch and then skate again, take a nap, do whatever," he said. "I kind of enjoyed that."

Leaving Austria was not an easy decision for Pöck but it was made easier with his family's support.

"My mom said she would love to have me at home, but if I wanted to play hockey somewhere else and have something different, it was okay with her," said Pock. "She's got two more [sons] at home."

It was relatively easy for Pock to adjust to American culture because of his traveling experiences. Soderholm also attributes Pock's easy transition to his personality.

"He's a pretty worldly guy and I think he fit in [with American culture] real well," said Soderholm.

"He's an open person and it's real easy to fit in if you're that way."

Warner, who is also his roommate, agrees.

"He's real friendly," explained Warner. "He talks to everybody. He's probably the friendliest kid in the dorm. We probably wouldn't know any one on our floor if it weren't for Tennis."

The two are helping each other learn their different cultures and are dealing well with the language barrier.

"I was nervous at first because I didn't know how well he spoke English," Warner said. "But he uses some big words. I'm pretty impressed."

They've even managed to have some fun together and played a joke on one of Warner's friends. They told him this was the first time Pock had watched color TV because they only have black and white in Austria.

But if there is one thing that Pock misses from home it's the food.

"My mom is a really good cook," he explained. "She's got a lot of good stuff like all Austrian food though. You don't have that here."

Pock plans to get used to the food, though. He hopes to play in the NHL when his college career is over.

"I'm going to play as best as possible and see what happens, but I definitely want to play professional by," he said.

Pock's passion for hockey stems not only from his natural talents, but other things as well – a love for the game and a desire to make his father, who was and still is, his role model, proud.

"Everything I know so far about hockey I learned from him," Pock said. "He always talked to me about my game and was the biggest critic/cheerleader I ever had. Whatever happened, he was never happy with the way I played, but now I think he's pretty proud of me. Not that many Austrians have made it over here."

to keep the Minutemen in the game for most of the first half, eventually the inability of Mack and Shannon Crooks to deliver anything in the way of offensive production spelled doom for the Maroon and White.

The duo failed to score a single point until Mack knocked down a pair of free throws with 2:53 remaining in the first frame, and would total only 11 combined points on the night. In the second half, Crooks would score six points in a span of 43 seconds, but that would prove to be the only outburst either of UMass' two leading scorers would have.

"When two of our best guys go 2-for-18 you are going to struggle," Flint said.

However, it was also the stifling Husky defense that forced Mack into an 0-for-9 shooting night, as well as a game plan designed to stop the sharpshooter from single handedly winning the contest by himself.

"At times it was the best we'd played all year," UConn Head Coach Jim Calhoun said. "We defended, and we identified Mack all night. Every time he got the ball we doubled him and then rotated down. Someone was always there when he came off the circle play or stagger screen and we disallowed him to get past us."

In the second half, an Albert Mouring three ball from the corner extended the Husky lead to 24 with 14:21 left. And although the Minutemen used an 11-2 run to close the gap to 15 a few minutes later, UConn's Caron Butler promptly scored seven unanswered points of his own to push the lead back into insurmountable waters.

For the game, Mouring would lead the Huskies with 20 points, while Butler and Johnnie Selvie totaled 14 each.

With the game firmly out of reach, UMass' Jameel Pugh was able to score his first collegiate points and excite the crowd with two thundering dunks, but in the end his seven points did nothing but make the score more respectable.

The Minutemen return to action on Thursday when they take on BU. The game will be at 7 p.m. at Walter Brown Arena in Boston.

Sox sign Ramirez, make progress

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

After a disappointing 2000 season, the Boston Red Sox management, fans and writers all knew there were three major problems that had to be addressed over the off-season for the 2001 campaign to be successful.

Problem No. 1 following John Valentin's season ending injury after just ten games, Boston expected 22 year-old Wilton Veras to step up and take over the position. Veras was never able to reach his potential, batting a pitiful .244 while driving in a paltry 14 runs in 164 at-bats.

Trading for other third basemen (Ed Sprague and Sean Berry) didn't do the team much good either. Sprague never got comfortable here, mustering only a .216 average. Berry, meanwhile, never even had time to unpack. He played only one game for the Sox before getting the ax.

Problem No. 2) Troy O'Leary had been improving his offensive numbers every year going into the 2000 campaign, but O'Leary's 2000 performance killed the Sox offensively. The number five spot in the batting order went from solid to putrid. O'Leary struggle to keep his batting average over .200 for much of the season and ended the season at .261 while driving in only 70 runs. This after the leftfielder hit .290 and drove in 103 runs the season before. Driving in only 70 runs when batting behind Nomar Garciaparra (.372 Avg.) and Carl Everett (.300) is very disappointing.

Problem No. 3) The Red Sox were never able to develop a number two starter. Pedro Martinez is, hands down, the best pitcher in baseball, but he can only pitch once every five days. Pedro's older brother, Ramon Martinez, was expected to serve as the team's second starter. But the elder Martinez was only able to muster brief moments of greatness, surrounded by severe ugliness. Martinez the elder, posted a horrific 6.13 ERA and went 10-8 while receiving a team-best 7.1 runs of support every time out. This is what you can accept from a No. 4 or 5 starter, but not from the No. 2 guy.

General Manager Dan Duquette had these issues in mind when he began his hunt for fresh meat in this year's free agency market. To address the Red Sox third base problems, Duquette sent two minor leaguers, infielder Donnie Sadler and outfielder Michael Coleman, to Cincinnati for 27-year-old third baseman, Chris Stynes. Many have never heard of Stynes, but by June, the Queens native will be a fan favorite.

Stynes played in 119 games last year for the Reds. He lead the team in batting, with a .334 average and was third in on-base percentage, behind only stars Barry Larkin and Ken Griffey. He will be a welcome addition to the Sox clubhouse and should solidify the third base position nicely.

Just this Monday, Duquette made the biggest splash in the Sox' off-season, signing former Indians outfielder Manny Ramirez to the second biggest contract in baseball history (8 years, $160 million). Ramirez, who has averaged .324, 42 home runs, and 142 RBIs over the last three seasons, should greatly improve a Red Sox offense that has been impotent minus Garciaparra and Everett.

The Ramirez signing was key. After hiking ticket prices an astronomical 45 percent, the team had to justify the increase with major on-field improvements. A meat of the order consisting of Nomar, Ramirez and Everett could be the best in baseball, and will strike fear into the hearts of pitchers everywhere, even in the Bronx.

The pitching issue has yet to be resolved. While the Sox have one of the top two or three bullpens in the American League, it proved last year that it cannot completely hide a terrible starting rotation. There is some good news, however. Rolando Arrojo, acquired in a trade from the Rockies way back in ...looked solid over the final 2 months of the regular season, dropping his ERA a full point, and may develop into a very good No. 3, or even an average No. 2 starter over the 2001 campaign.

The Sox can also look forward to the steady improvement of youngster Tomokazu Ohka, who started out shaky after being called up from Pawtucket in July, but pitched very well down the stretch, ending up with an impressive 3.12 ERA.

Expect at least one more moderate move from Duquette, as he needs to unload an outfielder, hopefully O'Leary, and continues looking for some pitching. The latest news has the Seattle Mariners interested in Veras. They have two pitchers they would be willing to part with, lefty Jamie Moyer, and righty Brett Tomko. Either would be a solid pickup for the Sox.

Whatever happens between now and opening day, Red Sox Nation can rest assured that this team will be improved from last year's disappointment and should be very fun to watch. The Red Sox have been talking about adding a right-handed power hitter for years and they have finally done so. Good job by Duquette, finally.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – A look back yields a rare look at things really were at a time when you may have been too confused to see as clearly as possible.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Every now and then you are in the mood to change things dramatically and head off in a new direction. Today is likely to be just such a day.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) –You may have to tend to a few of last week's issues today before the coming workweek is upon you. You don't want to trip over loose ends!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You must be willing to avoid a conflict at all costs today. Aggressive behavior is not likely to pay off.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Now is the time for you to turn on the heat and face an opponent with guns blazing. Failure to be aggressive now may spell defeat for you.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Romantic situations abound today, and it is up to you to take advantage of an opportunity and turn it into an important personal episode.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You know what you want – but you do know what you don't want? Knowing the difference will make the difference today – and in the future.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may be getting in your own way these days because you insist on stopping and thinking about things at every turn. Trust in momentum!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You mustn't allow yourself to become upset about those things that are completely out of your control. You must realize your limitations.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You'll attract a great deal of attention today, but you'll want your privacy when the time comes. You can have both if you just wait your turn.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You're in the mood for some quiet time spent with a close friend or loved one. You can have it, but you mustn't neglect a pressing issue.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – A change of direction may be appropriate at this time, but today you'll have to concentrate on more specific, down-to-earth concerns.

Huskies take a bite out of the Minutemen

UConn rolls past UMass to extend skid to six games

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

HARTFORD, CT – When a team's leading scorer is unable to hit a single field goal throughout the entire contest, it is usually not a good sign for the success of that team.

For the Massachusetts men's basketball team, the fact that Monty Mack's only three points of the game came from the line, contributed to the 82-67 drubbing the Minutemen took at the hands of the No. 11 Connecticut Huskies last night at the Hartford Civic Center.

Even though the final margin of victory was only 15, the score was not indicative of how the Huskies controlled almost every aspect of the annual U-game.

"We didn't make shots and we didn't defend," UMass Head Coach James "Bruiser" Flint said. "When [UConn] smells blood they step on you and that is what they did."

The loss was the sixth in a row for the Maroon and White, making it the longest losing streak Flint has had during his five years in Amherst. It was also UMass' 18th loss in the last 19 times these two teams have played, and dropped the Minutemen to 1-6 on the year. Connecticut, on the other hand, improved to 8-1 with the victory.

Despite the fact that UConn led by as much as 25 by the time the middle of the second half rolled around, the Maroon and White were able to compete with the Huskies at the beginning of the contest. Micah Brand's hook shot over seven foot Connecticut center Justin Brown with 14:07 remaining, put UMass up by a score of 10-8.

But that was not the only good play of the half for Brand, as he managed to net nine points in the first frame on his way to a team-high 13 for the game. Brand was also game's leading rebounder with nine.

The other player who came out strong for the Minutemen was Winston Smith. He continued his stellar play of late by drilling a crisp pass to a wide-open Jackie Rogers for a dunk with 10:40 left in the first half, and then drilled a three from the left wing a few minutes later to close the UConn gap to six, 25-19.

He would pick up a solid nine points, four rebounds and a pair of assists by the time the game was over, with seven of those nine points coming in the first half.

"Winston played well and Micah had his moments," Flint said. "But we have got to finish shots. We had some open looks that we didn't knock down, and after a while it becomes self-conscious – you begin to defend yourself a little bit."

By the time the first half ended with UConn's Tony Robertson laying the ball in as time expired, the Huskies had pushed their lead to 42-26, and would not be seriously threatened for the remainder of the contest.

While Brand and Smith were able

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

UConn men's basketball coach Jim Calhoun got the better his counterpart, UMass general James 'Bruiser' Flint, in last night's 82-67 win for the No. 11 Huskies at the Hartford Civic Center.

UMass fans should put class on their holiday shopping list

HARTFORD, CT – It was oddly fitting that last night's U-game between the men's basketball teams of Massachusetts and Connecticut was sponsored by an insurance agent.

Does MassMutual sell job insurance?

The murmur of voices that began several weeks ago demanding the firing of UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint has heightened to a steady rumble. Even before last night's 82-67 loss dropped the Minutemen to 1-6, former fans of the fifth-year coach were clamoring that change was necessary for the team to turn itself around.

ADAM WHITE

Several fans in the home cheering section of the William D. Mullins Center last week against Providence were heard chanting "bye bye, Bruiser," in the closing moments of UMass' 85-70 loss to the Friars.

Last night, a number of supposed supporters of the Maroon and White were seen holding up less-than-loyal messages for Flint at the Hartford Civic Center. "Please can Bruiser and employ Bob Knight," read one sign.

"All I want for Christmas is Rick Pitino," said another.

What these fans should be asking Santa for this season is a little class. Following your struggling team into its archrival's arena only to chastise your own coach isn't clever. It's downright embarrassing. Why would anyone take the time to make up a sign like those displayed in Hartford knowing how hard this team is working to right the ship? What good is having your fans with you on the road if they are only there to heap further grief on you?

No one is trying to hide from the fact that the Minutemen have lost six straight. Both the coach and the players have taken accountability for UMass' ineptitude on the court, stressing a need to win games before further damage is done to the group's collective psyche.

"There's no doubt that we are absolutely struggling right now," said tri-captain Winston Smith, whose inspired play has been one of the few bright spots over the dismal stretch.

"My confidence is high as a player, but I'd much rather just be winning. How the team does is a lot more important than me as a player."

The weight of expectation hanging over Coach Flint's head became even greater late Monday night, when news broke that former UMass favorite Bill Bayno was fired from his position as head coach at Nevada – Las Vegas. A longtime friend of Flint, Bayno became the latest victim of an industry where winning is placed at the forefront of criteria for job security.

"I cried," said Flint of his reaction to the news. "The only person I've spent more time with in my life, other than my wife, was Bayno."

Bayno's termination came less than 24 hours after the program was hit with four years probation for alleged recruitment violations regarding Lamar Odom in 1996-97. Despite being cleared of any wrongdoing in the incident, Bayno was fired because, in the words of UNLV president Carol Hunter, "The head coach is responsible for the integrity of the basketball program."

Speculation is that the team's poor start this season (3-4, including a lopsided loss to rival Nevada last Saturday) and the Rebels' inability to get past the first round of the NCAA tournament under Bayno are what ultimately spelled the sixth-year coach's demise.

So where does that leave Flint?

After last night's defeat at the hands of the eleventh-ranked Huskies, Flint now stands at 72-63 in four-plus seasons at the helm of the Maroon and White. The team's recent skid has it in the unfortunate position of heading into Atlantic 10 play with a losing record, needing to essentially dominate conference play in order to salvage the season and, most likely, Flint's job.

"With sports nowadays, you either win or you're gone," Smith said.

"Bruiser is a good coach who works hard for us. We know what we have to do to help him, we've talked about it, now we just have to get it done."

But unlike the "fans" who have injected shame into the support that the team so desperately needs, Flint has hope that his squad can pull off the turnaround and prevent him from suffering the same fate as his friend to the west.

"I'm just disappointed that we're 1-6, but I can still turn it around," Flint said. "[Bayno's firing] came all of a sudden, but I know what I've got to do. I can still see the light at the end of the tunnel."

UNH last hurdle of semester for Minutewomen

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

One more game.

That's all that is left for the Massachusetts women's basketball team this semester. The Minutewomen (3-5) are heading to the University of New Hampshire today to light for a big momentum swing that would come by the means of a much needed win. UMass is on a four game slide and it is hoping that its first win on the road will come tonight at the expense of the Wildcats.

"They're a good basketball team," Head Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "We match up very well with them. They do a solid job on defense. They worry me a little."

The Wildcats (5-5) are coming off a big 20-point win over Towson University, which ended a painful four game win drought. They have also defeated the likes of Brown and Dartmouth. On the flipside, a notable loss came from the hands of Holy Cross, which UMass beat in overtime at the Mullins Center.

UNH is led in the post by a tall sister duo that is capable of changing the complexion of any game. Six-foot five-inch center Anna Mathias leads the team in points per game (15.3) and rebounds per game (5.9). Her sister, Maren, comes off the bench to score seven points and grab five boards per game. They're dangerous.

In the backcourt, senior guard Kelly Donahue calls the shots for the Wildcats. Donahue is getting help at the off-guard spot from Kiki Procter, who is coming off her best game of the season in which she tied her personal high in points (14).

"They have two solid post players [the Mathias sisters] who do a good job. Donahue is a great little guard who does a fine job at the point."

The Minutewomen will once again look to senior standout Kathy Coyner to run the show. Coyner has been consistent at executing the point guard responsibilities effectively, and she has displayed a reliable three-point shot that has been money all season long.

Sophomore center Jen Butler is looking to break out of a mold of mediocrity that has restrained her in the past four games. Butler started the season hot, averaging double-double numbers that included a triple-double against Charlotte, but has cooled off since. In the past four games, all of which were losses, Butler has been held to mortal numbers; it seems apparent that the success of this UMass team depends on the play of Butler in the post.

"It's only UNH, so it shouldn't be a big game, right? Wrong. This game is going to be one of the 'make it or break it' games forthe Minutewomen this season; UMass is walking a very fine line. If UMass wins, it can transcend that momentum into two weeks of strong practices until they head to Alabama for the St. Peter's Tournament. A win ends the losing streak and puts the Maroon and White back on track to .500. This would also be the Minutewomen's first road win of the season, which needs to come soon.

A loss will crush this team. The team is young and inexperienced, and needs to get back on the winning track before it finds itself playing catch-up for an even record.

"This game is huge," O'Brien said. "It's our last game going into the Christmas break. It may be one of the biggest games of the season for us. The biggest thing is our pressure defense. If we can execute that, we force turnovers and make things happen."

Hopefully, Santa will come early for the Minutewomen and bring UMass a little bit of luck in its quest for its fourth win.

Budget meeting canceled

The locked doors of the Campus Center Auditorium greeted the small group of students, professors and other community members who rose early to attend a meeting to discuss budget cuts.

The meeting, called by Chancellor David K. Scott, was scheduled for 8:30 a.m. yesterday before being inexplicably canceled. Many had already felt that the original timing was inconvenient.

"It was scheduled early so that students wouldn't be here," Lynne Hajjar, a senior Communication major said.

That the cancellation came with no notice angered and surprised many.

"You're serious?" asked Communication Professor Mari Paredes standing in front of the locked doors. "You can't be serious."

"How come we weren't notified?" asked Manula Littlefield of the Bilingual Collegiate Program.

Several members of various unions stood outside the locked auditorium.

Donna Johnson, president of the University Staff Association, stood at the foot of the escalators.

"We were here to see what the Chancellor had to say about the upcoming budget cuts," she said.

Justin Cobb, a member of Service Employees International Union (SEIU) Local 509, works for Customer Services and Work Management at the Physical Plant.

"We've been asked to submit budget cut proposals: 1.5 percent in the first year, five to seven percent the second year and ten percent the third year," he said.

The meeting was cancelled on Friday, December 8 and has been postponed until early next year.

"The person who scheduled the meeting can cancel it at any point. It's not our responsibility to announce cancellations," Scheduling Coordinator Melanie Ford said.

The Chancellor's office takes responsibility for the cancellation.

"The Chancellor feels that we'll know more about the budget then," said Becky Dean, Assistant to the Chancellor.

"A mailing did go out on Friday. I assumed it got to everybody. I apologize if that's not the case," Dean said.

The Chancellor's office asserts that this meeting was not a campus wide meeting open to the public, however.

"It was never intended to be a campus wide meeting." University spokesperson Kay Scanlan said. "I don't know how that got out."

Deans, union officials and student leaders were invited to the meeting.

"We wouldn't turn away students, though," Scanlan said. "It was a campus wide meeting for certain people who were spread across the campus."

The small group assembled at the foot of the Campus Center's escalators questioned the Chancellor's motives in postponing the meeting and rescheduling. The Chancellor's office insists that this isn't a dodge.

"We will make certain that the students will be back. The student leaders are an important part of this process," Scanlan.

Gore concedes, urges unity

Al Gore

More than five weeks after election day, George W. Bush accepted the mantle of the presidency after Al Gore conceded the race to the Texas governor. Both candidates addressed the nation last night.

Speaking from the Eisenhower Executive Office building Gore said that he spoke with Bush on the phone just prior to his address and "congratulated him on becoming the 43rd President of the United States."

"For the sake of our unity as a people and the strength of our democracy, I offer my concession," Gore said.

Introduced by Texas House speaker Pete Laney, a Democrat, President-elect Bush stressed the need for bipartisanship, claiming "our nation must rise above a house divided."

"Republicans want the best for our nation, and so do Democrats," Bush said from the Speaker's chair of the House Chamber of the Texas Legislature.

Bush presented the nation with a glimpse of his legislative goals, stressing the need for tax relief, expressing a desire to provide prescription drugs for seniors, and said he would work to improve education, recalling his campaign mantra to "leave no child behind."

Bush and Gore also agreed to meet "early next week" and "agreed to try to heal the divisions in the country" according to Bush.

Gore's concession came after the United States Supreme Court's late Wednesday decision overturning the Florida Supreme Court's order to recount all of the state's disputed votes manually.

"Seven justices of this Court agree that there are constitutional problems with the recount ordered by the Florida Supreme Court," according to a 7-2 "per curiam," or unsigned, opinion in the case of Bush v. Gore.

The High Court also found, by a 5-4 margin, that there was no constitutionally feasible means to conduct any new counts or recounts before the meeting of the Electoral College on December 18th to elect the next President.

"Because it is evident that any recount seeking to meet the December 12 date will be unconstitutional for the reasons we have discussed, we reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Florida," the decision said.

Justice John Paul Stevens, in strongly worded dissent, wrote that the Supreme Court's settled practice in matters relating to state law is to trust to the interpretation of the highest state court.

"Although we may never know with complete certainty the identity of the winner of this year's presidential election, the identity of the loser is perfectly clear. It is the nation's confidence in the judge as an impartial guardian of the rule of the law," Stevens said in his dissent.

In his address, Gore expressed disappointment with the Supreme Court decision, but said that he would accept it.

"While I strongly disagree with the Court's decision, I accept it," Gore said. Adding, "This election was resolved, as it must be resolved, by our democratic institutions."

Gore's hopes for overturning Bush's certified electoral victory in Florida had hinged on the possibility of counting the state's undervotes, which machines had been unable to count as votes for either candidate.

Earlier yesterday, Gore ordered his recount team in Florida to cease all activities, and also spoke with his legal team via conference call thanking them for their efforts since election day.

George W. Bush's ascension to the White House lasted 36 days longer than anyone expected. Bush was declared the winner of the presidential election by many major media outlets in the early morning of Wednesday November 8th. Shortly after Gore called and conceded the election to Bush, only to call the Governor back a half-hour later to retract his concession as the race in Florida tightened.

In the five weeks since Gore insisted that more Floridians cast their ballots for him than did for Bush, calling for manual recounts in several south Florida counties. Gore mounted a series of legal challenges to Bush's razor-thin lead in Florida throughout the past month, resulting in a seesaw of rulings and appeals, ending finally with the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court to end all recounts.

Gore won the popular vote by over 300,000 votes and earned more electoral votes – 267 – than any losing presidential candidate in American history. With Florida safely in Bush's electoral column he won 271 votes, only one more than the 270 votes necessary to gain victory in the Electoral College.

President-elect Bush will face series of grim historical facts upon assuming the presidency: a highly divided Congress with a 50-50 split between Republicans and Democrats in the U.S. Senate for the first time in U.S. history, and a slim Republican majority in the House of Representatives. Bush is also the first President in the 20th century elected after receiving less votes than his opposition.

Students concerned about offensive play

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Theatre Department's production of House of Wives has come under fire from Muslim student groups on campus.

The Arab Students Club has released a document entitled "Polygamy Revisited," in which it claims the play "creates a false picture of the lives of the majority of Muslim women."

Director Lucinda Kidder agrees.

"The play does not create an accurately portray Islamic life," she said. "It's not supposed to. The play is an allegory."

Rana Al-Jammal, a graduate student and member of the Muslim Students Association and the ASC, explained the Islamic community's position.

"My membership is outraged. A lot of our members are upset and appalled at the portrayal of Muslim identity in the play," Al-Jammal said.

"We protest the choice of the play, especially at a University that claims to embrace diversity stereotyping and portraying stereotypes and misinformation."

While she personally hasn't seen the play, Al-Jammal says that the advertisements and reading the script was enough to decide.

Jasmine Khamis, a member of the Muslim Students Association at Mt. Holyoke College, wrote a critique of the play. In it, she states the play "portrayed women as less than second class citizens, subordinate and abject to the domineering will of the patriarch in society."

Others are troubled that the play is running during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

The Theatre Department says that the scheduling of the play is not intentional.

"That was pure coincidence, dictated by the way we have to schedule plays in the theatres to fit," said Anne-Maria Goossens, Publicity Director for the Theatre Department. "It is not intended as a slap."

"We knew when we started looking into this play that it was going to raise questions," Goossens said. The department sponsored a lecture and workshop series to discuss those concerns.

"When we first asked permission to do this play, the author, Fatimah Gallaire, was very aware that her work would be seen as anti-Islam," said dramaturge Thomas Shstead. He added that the discussions were designed to circumvent that fear.

Al-Jammal charges that the discussions were held to appease the Islamic community.

Students shiver, 'Chill with Frosty' an SGA event

By Karen Madsen
Collegian Staff

"Chillin' with Frosty," a Southwest Area government-sponsored event helped students campus-wide usher in the holiday spirit this Tuesday in the Hampden Center in Southwest.

Activities included hot cocoa, paper snowflake making, and pin the tale on Frosty. The holiday atmosphere was accentuated by Yuletide music and there was also be door prizes, and free food. Event manager Luke Durocher, a junior Event Managing major, wanted to put people in the holiday mood.

"Something needed to be done to get people out and together," he said.

Durocher also managed to convince his roommate Michael Chan, a sophomore Theatre major, to don a Frosty costume.

"Frosty has always been a symbol of what's best about the holiday Season," Durocher said. "He's just a fun-loving guy, who just likes to be himself and have fun."

Chan's favorite comment came from a student who told him, "You're my favorite, even better than Santa."

Berkshire Dinning Services donated 30 dozen cookies, as well as coffee and hot cocoa. Cinemark, the newly opened movie theater in Hadley, donated movie passes, which were given out among the door prizes.

According to Kerry Mulcahy, Southwest Governor and junior English major, "Chillin' with Frosty," allows students to celebrate Winter "Southwest-style." Mulcahy, who recently returned from buying $100 worth of season appropriate decorations and raffle prizes from K-Mart for the event, claimed, "It's going to be fun."

This ambitious community building activity was highly endorsed by Southwest Area government.

"Southwest area government rocks out," Mulcahy enthusiastically exclaimed. "We've worked really hard. Tonight we're spending two hours decorating."

Officer Jacquelyn Leahy, a freshman School of Management major, highly enjoyed the event.

"Running around with Frosty was a lot of fun," she said. "It's great to see so many people come down and celebrate winter."

Other guest seemed to agree.

Megan Rilla, a senior Sociology major loved the activities and prizes.

"I got to make snowflakes and have my picture taken with Frosty," said Rilla.

The night culminated in the coronation of Meagan Ventura as Snow Queen.

"She [Kidder] used the meetings to justify what she did," Al-Jammal said.

The producers deny that the play is anti-Islamic.

"I would have to say that the play is an allegory. It is about the evolution, the strength and solidarity of women," Kidder said. "It is not intended to be true to Arab culture."

Carolyn Shread, one of the translators of the play, agrees.

"It is not realistic. It is not intended to be realistic," she said. "It's disappointing. To talk about stereotypes gets tedious."

"We did send a script," Thomas said. "Whenever I went down to the Muslim Student Association's office they were closed."

"It's a celebration of women. It is not about polygamy, it's not about Islam. Polygamy is not exclusive to Islam and it is not the rule in Islam," he added. "Quite frankly, these protests are quite insulting after all the work we put it into to make sure that interested parties had a say."

Mini-Mall's last campus day is today

Lindsey Knox
Collegian Correspondent

With a wide variety of products ranging from CD's to African woodcarvings, tie-dye to Indian tapestries to silver jewelry to hair accessories, the annual UMass Mini-Mall has everything that the holiday shopper needs.

The Mini-Mall, which is organized by the UMass Jewish Student Union, is located in the Student Union Ballroom from 10a.m. to 4 p.m. The event began Dec 12 and runs until Dec 14. It is open to the public, and the admission is free.

"The purpose of the Mini-Mall is to bring local artists and vendors together, and to provide an easy and fun way for students to do holiday shopping," Rebecca Russell, Coordinator for the Mini-Mall said.

According to Russell, the Mini-Mall has been an event for the past 15 years and is a great success every year.

"There is such a variety of products that everyone can find something," Russell said. "A lot of people even do shopping for themselves."

Don Dabreu, one vendor in particular who has been selling mainly CD's and video's at the mini-mall for the past five years. He was introduced to the event by one of his friend's who is a vendor on the campus center concourse.

"This is how I make a living," Dabreu said. "I do a lot of college vending. This gives me the opportunity to be in one spot for more than one day."

Russell said that the Mini-Mall is not just for students either.

"The more people we see the better," Russell said. "We advertise a lot through the campus center, and have limited flyering in academic buildings. It would be nice to see some faculty here."

Anne Marie Foley, a senior Latin American Studies major would like to see more products made by students being sold at the mini-mall. She also commented on the prices of certain products, saying that they were too pricey for students.

"I have seen most of these vendors uptown," Foley said. "Not that it isn't great, but I would like to see more diverse products. Students would charge lower prices, mainly because students know where students come from."

Foley then added, "I would like to buy a lot of stuff. I have to hold myself back because I can't afford it."

Elissa Bhanti, who sold Indian textiles, jewelry, and clothing had vended at the mini-mall five years ago, remembered about the event and contacted the UMass Jewish Student Union to see if she could vend again. Bhanti has been vending for six years and has a retail shop in Vermont where she sells her products wholesale.

"This is not a good opportunity [for her]," Bhanti said. "This is a bad time of the year. Five years ago it was much busier. I was worried about coming by myself, but it has been so slow."

Stelan Von Imhof, a sophomore Marketing Major, who attended the mini-mall felt that there was a large variety of products being offered.

"This is a good idea because it saves you a trip to the real mall," Imhof said. "For what I saw I guess the products are reasonable, but they aren't cheap though. Some stuff I can find for the same or lower at other places."

According to Russell, products range from $1 to $100, but for the most part the average is $10-$20. Russell also said that she tries to get vendor's whose products suit college student budgets, knowing well that if a product is too expensive they won't buy it.

"I don't want an artist who won't sell anything or students who come in and can't see anything they can afford," Russell said.

The Daily Collegian: End of year review

With this, the 69th issue of volume 107 of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, we are officially ready to put the fall 2000 semester to bed. All that remains now are finals, and putting an exclamation point academically on a semester that has hopefully been a success for our readers.

The Collegian shifted into high gear this term, with new leadership and an array of changes to both the content and presentation of this publication. But none of that would matter without the stories themselves, and this semester has given us a wealth of memorable events that have kept us busy writing and all of you (hopefully) busy reading.

So here are, in no particular order, the biggest stories of fall 2000:

1.) Security cameras – Who could forget the "Big Brother" story from September? Even as the administration fought to keep a veil of secrecy over its Orwellian security measures in Southwest, we showed you exactly where the infamous camera was. Not that it stopped any of the residents there from rioting anyway.

2.) Corruption on campus – Mr. Coopee, if you would like the rotten joist from your porch back, we still have it. To the cheers of the underappreciated Physical Plant staff, we blew the lid off the type of abuse that allegedly goes on every day at UMass. Sadly, the University's subsequent "investigation" into the incident revealed no wrongdoing. Oh well – that just means we'll have to work twice as hard on the dozen or so corruption leads we've gotten since.

3.) The SGA, the American presidency and Ralph Nader – What else can be said about our beloved student government? Mr. Howe, Mr. Avakian et al have somehow managed to make our national election look completely legitimate. The Republican Club vandalism bit was an especially nice touch. And for any of you still lamenting about Nader putting George W. Bush in the White House, blame your fellow students who thought the Green Party had something to do with marijuana.

4.) The Southwest Olympics - "Cat football" was arguably the saddest story we have ever had the displeasure to report. Furniture burning and bottle throwing came in right behind, however. The Subway Series had the UMPD walking on eggshells, but somehow the postgame mob scenes just weren't as volatile without Red Sox fans in them. At least the towers are still standing, and elevator surfing hasn't made a comeback.

5.) Administrative merry-go-round – Javier Cevallos is apparently staying, despite rumors to the contrary and the best administrative quote of the term ("I almost lost my job over a sit pack"). Chancellor Scott is apparently going, leaving behind a wake of controversy and more memorable quotes than Braveheart. President Bulger made a rare public appearance on campus in late September, if only to argue the economics of distance learning and give the runner-up for Quote of the Year ("You have a lot to say don't you, boy wonder?").

6.) Big sports teams go flat – Two years removed from a Division I-AA national title, UMass football finished 7-4 (5-3 in the Atlantic 10) and missed the playoffs for the first time under Head Coach Mark Whipple. Losses to Delaware and Hofstra at home and too-close-for-comfort victories over Division II New Haven and American International are big reasons why Whipple is rumored to be searching high and low for a new job. Men's basketball, meanwhile, lost six of its first seven to crank up the heat under beleaguered coach James "Bruiser" Flint. That after tri-captain Monty Mack was nabbed for shoplifting DVD movies from the Hampshire Mall K-Mart. So much for bringing the pride back to UMass.

Of course, there was plenty of good news as well. The anniversary of last year's campus rape crisis came and went without a sound, proving that peace makes for much better copy than fear. The Collegian and ALANA laid the foundation for a long-overdue bond that should increase diversity awareness campus-wide. The campus library added its three-millionth volume and remained upright.

So as we head into winter break, here's to another semester in the proverbial books. To all of our readers, we offer our traditional promise: as long as you'll keep reading and responding, we'll keep working our hardest to bring you the best possible coverage. In a word, thanks.

Rays of hope diminished

SAM WILKINSON

In a room full of inky black, there's a pinprick of light and it might be the light from some sort of progress or it might be the last little beam of fairness in this ridiculous world of ours. I'm hoping for the former but fearing that it's the latter.

Gore beat Bush by 300,000 votes and conceded the election last night, making that ray all the narrower and smaller.

It's a damned double bind, and it doesn't make an ounce of sense. It also doesn't seem remotely fair, but that's the way the proverbial chocolate chip cookie of possible pleasure crumbles. These are the little pieces that get swept under the rug, like the abject voter fraud, the subsequent non-counts of legitimate votes and the very real possibility that minorities were prevented from voting. Want to talk about an equal standard for all? Better be willing to enforce one, as minorities weren't treated equally by any stretch of anyone's imagination.

No matter where we looked this year, politics sucked like a chest wound. Gore couldn't campaign to save his life, the American public didn't elect George W. Bush and hell's bells, we had similar problems here at fine ol' UMass. The Student Government Association gets elected, then they're kind of elected, then they're not elected anymore.

So who really won? Well Bush won literally (he's going to be the next President), and so did Jeff Howe and Seth Avakian (say what they want, but they're trying to have a Senate that's not aggressively against them).

Who really came out in the middle? Gore, who probably hasn't seen his political career ended, although there are still those looking to push the knife in his ribcage just far enough to pierce his heart. Same with the Senators who got sacked last Wednesday night; most will return for office and get their seats back next February or whenever those elections are completed, again barring legitimate legal challenges.

In every competition there's winners and there's losers; unfortunately the losers in this case were everyone else, and that includes you and me, as well as men and women of the black silky satin – judges who saw their credibility hit rock bottom as they were used and abused by candidates.

First with the judges. The Supreme Court, the Florida Supreme Court and our own student Judiciary all got used as pawns by those who either sought or had power. The Supreme Courts turned and returned and overturned and underturned decisions, again and again, before finally saying that while one solution should work, there wasn't enough time for any to be actually found. A cop-out? Damned straight it's a cop-out. On campus, Gabe Tavarez's judiciary made the decision that it probably had to, and while they obviously went way too far in saying that Big Jim Eltringham should be brought up on Code of Student Conduct charges (he shouldn't be), their decision was probably slightly more fair than most people, including roughly everybody involved and nobody else, really think. The problem with both decisions was who really ended up benefiting, because it wasn't the rule of law or the people it was candidates.

Bush got his precious Oval Office and he'd better like it because he'll be moving on out in four years. Jeff and Seth will probably get their neutered Senate, but they better enjoy that because they only get to abuse them for a few meetings more before it's election time and we wave fondly as both head off into the Senate on their white mini-pony.

Those were the winners – the true losers were people, common people, from the Gore voter in Florida who punched the whole for Buchanan to the random freshman Senator from Sylvan who lost all faith in a Senate that claims to represent students. While the nation's economy is suddenly grinding down, our candidates are fighting amongst each other. Car companies are cutting thousands of jobs, but better get a chad counted or not counted, depending on who you support. (Insert the eye rolls at any point here.)

Meanwhile, on campus, the powers that be decided that students should get almost two full days to study – two, but not really two full days – instead, we get a buck and a half. Six quarters and nobody seems to have noticed. A quick call to other campuses around the nation reveals that, hell, even our biggest arch-rival in the world (although arch suggests, I suppose, the ability to not get destroyed on neutral courts) UConn grants two full days for studying. Other schools? U-Montana gives the ranchers out there two days, and a call back home to West Virginia U. revealed a two-day break. Seems slightly fishy, maybe our Student Government might stand up for students who are getting the big short changed stick right to the face, but unfortunately, the SGA can't. Cause we don't have one.

It's a disturbing thing when the people that are supposed to care, the people that are supposed to be concerned, care more for their own petty issues than the well-being of all of us. That's the nature of politics, nasty little barbs that I study for larks and generally despise in practice. The fact is that with any politics that end up with the good guys losing (all of us) and the bad guys winning (people that care more for their own needs than the needs of those that gave them their office), there's reason to be a cynic.

So maybe there's hope in the future, maybe the sun's rising on a dark campus and a dark nation, but there's no proof and I won't believe it till I see it.

Dorm cooking

ROB SCHULZE

Ah, dorm cooking.

"Dorm cooking?," you say. "I thought that there was only one kind of cooking, the kind where you cook the food. Isn't it the same anywhere you do it?" These are the things you say to me. This is the reason you are stupid.

Dorm cooking is vastly removed from all other kinds of food crafting. It is marked by an ingenuity, a resourcefulness, and a total lack the so-called 'standards' that plague all other kinds of cooking, except maybe for hobo cooking. (Hobos eat beans out of cans underneath the overpass.)

I speak from experience. I, personally, am both the gourmet and the gourmand of dorm cuisine. If it's there to be made, I've made it, or eaten it when someone else has made it. This is why I, like many of you, am a fat, fat lardass bastard.

My personal dorm cooking specialties are macaroni and cheese from a box, spaghetti with fried sauce, and Hamburger Helper in my closet. Macaroni and cheese from a box is easy enough to explain: I take a box of macaroni and cheese from the big-ass Costco package that my parents bought me in August, and then I make it. The only problem with this is that I don't have any measuring spoons, butter, or milk. I make up for this deficiency by scraping change out from the disgusting crusty folds of my futon to buy a little carton of milk from the machine in my dorm, using the little tub of vegetable oil spread that I bought in September for $1.29 as a butteresque substitute, and just kind of eyeing the measurements. It typically comes out edible.

Spaghetti with fried sauce goes a little like this: I take a thing of spaghetti from the big-ass Costco package that my parents bought me in August and I boil it in my pot. I then take a thing of canned spaghetti sauce from a similar package bought at the same time as all the others (the label actually says "Spaghetti Sauce" on it) and fry it. I do this because the only cooking implements I own are a pot and a frying pan, so my only real option (what with the pasta occupying my pot) is to fry up my sauce, dorm-style. After is comes to a nice simmering fry, I kind of scrape it off the inside of the pan onto the pasta in the bowl. It tastes like ass. I eat it anyways.

Hamburger Helper in my closet is exactly what it sounds like: several boxes of Hamburger Helper (from Costco) sitting in my closet because it takes too much effort to make them. I think I'm going to give them to the homeless when I move out.

Other examples of fine dorm cooking not done by me:

- Anything involving the George Foreman grill
- Frozen meatballs boiled in extra spaghetti sauce
- Easy Mac
- Microwave anything
- Stealing your roommate's food and then denying it
- Filling water bottle with DC milk
- Vodka in a Mickey Mouse Dixie cup
- Really good banana bread and blueberry muffins (much props to Andrea, Jess, Jay, and Beth for that)
- Being hungry all the time

So, in essence, dorm cooking sucks. You end up using implements that were never designed to be placed anywhere near a food product (i.e. blowdryers, irons, paint scrapers, sporks) to actually create a meal. It isn't defendable by any stretch of the imagination, but that's OK. What really matters is that at least it isn't the DC.

Notes from the Campus Center basement

My day has come and gone. After three and a half years of college education, I am wandering blindly into the sunset. Well, you too would be blind if you wandered into the sun, setting or rising. You also would probably get a terrible tan and loose a lot of weight. Oh well, perhaps I'll wander off when the sun is hiding. I like myself the way I am.

I assume that some of you are curious why my pen name is Boo Downs rather than Shawn R. Downs. Given that my columns are more serious than the average bear's, it would then be logical that I use my real name. Then again, my birth name was Shawn Francis Griggs. But that's another story.

BLLAARRRRGGGHHHHH! I always wanted to do that.

I was described in UMass Magazine as "a massive, talkative chap who seems to be eternally caffeinated." You draw your own conclusions.

Do you sleep with a stuffed animal? It could be a bear, sheep, bunny rabbit, or anything that comes to mind. Even in college, when you don't have someone else to cuddle up to, do you take solace in this childhood object? Well, I don't.

You know, some people should have their oxygen privileges revoked. End of story.

Have I ever been in love before? It's none of your business.

I praise UVC-TV19 for generating interest in television production and promoting diversity. I also praise UVC for helping me make my first feature film. To the future alumnus of the station, you'll go places; you know who you are.

To all you nice guys: you'll get what's coming to you. Nice guys just have to wait a little longer. To you failed personifications of masculinity: watch your breathing.

BOO DOWNS

In the Collegian, there are some people who have gone above and beyond the call of duty in running a newspaper. Two people in particular have stood out in my mind, and while controversy will always circle the paper, these people need credit. These two people are Sam Wilkinson and Kristi Ceccarossi. Sam Wilkinson has been revolutionary in evolving the paper. While the changes are perhaps too abrupt and severe, the paper will benefit in the long run. In saying this, I strongly suggest those with diversity interests take action in participating in the new paper. It will be the only way to get your voices heard. As an associate editor to the Ed/Op page, I plead with you to submit pieces. Rob Schulze, the Ed/Op editor, has made a pledge to print as many student columns as possible. This is your chance to secure a columnist slot before any major changes are implemented. On the subject of diversity, Kristi Ceccarossi should be considered a hero of sorts. She is one woman on an almost all male staff, and she continually fights huge odds in order to provide a conscience to a sometimes jaded male group. Good luck with all of them.

It's only a matter of time before Seth Koenig and I will rule the world. While most of you were drinking and partying, we were plotting world domination. The Earth shall be ours!

I owe it to Seth, Torrey, and Janine to mention them in my farewell. The four of us are the Applebee's crew, and have probably have set the Guinness Book of Records for the number of times sitting in an Applebee's booth.

I suffer from the Clark Kent syndrome. Disguised as mildly hyperactive college student Shawn Downs, Boo Downs is the defender of level headed thought. My picture doesn't include glasses, but I wear them. I recently started wearing contact lenses again, and suddenly now everybody recognizes me!

The reason that I am Boo Downs rather than Shawn Downs besides it being my nickname, my radio personality name, and my movie character name is that it challenges me not to take myself too seriously. I don't want to expose my megalomania just yet. Are you happy?

I would like to thank everybody who knows me for their role in shaping my college experience. To make such a list would be tedious, and I don't think you want to hear every Kylie, Nicky, or Emily that has come down my path. But for good or for worse, you've my life that more interesting.

For the readers, my heart goes to you for putting up with me for two years. When random person X comes up to me and congratulates me on a good column, it's be best compliment I can experience. Thank you all.

Time for me to leave into the sunset. I have really strong sunscreen on, and I have several bottles of water in my backpack just in case. In a few years, when I am among the stars, I hope to hear from you again. As Def Leppard's Joe Elliot says, "Don't forget us, and we won't forget you." Bye now.

Q: [illegible] President [illegible] greatest [illegible] band scene experiencing. George [illegible] has never released a CD, and Al Gore never made a movie, but the election debacle gave actual entertainers a run for their money. And, of course, it provided stand up comedians and late-night TV writers with more material than they knew what to do with – anyone catch Weekend Update on "SNL" this weekend? Good stuff.

We can make predictions about the future of Presidential elections in the wake of such a media-devoured national embarrassment, and they don't look good. Considering that elections take place only once every four years, each one has a significant role in shaping the public's perception of what they are and ought to be. Will people come to expect this sort of drama, or consider it a natural part of the process? I think we all have less faith in the egalitarianism of our court system after the OJ Simpson trial; will the same thing happen here? Commercial interests have always had their hands in the arts, both manipulating and exploiting them, and how much of an extension is it to think that some media conglomerate might try to turn public stewardship into another money-making machine? Comparisons to "Survivor" are too easy, so I won't bother.

Here's the stupid part: Why didn't we care as much before it became a matter of a few hundred people in one little section of the country? Why the minute-by-minute coverage about circular accusations, but only glossy, dodgy articles about actual issues during the bulk of campaigning? One answer is, of course, that the candidates weren't all that different or interesting, so we didn't have much of a reason to care. Another answer, however, is that the drama wasn't there. In a nation of easily distracted slackers, it takes more than run-of-the-mill politics to grab out attention (even if those politics might affect all our lives, everyday). It takes scandal, confrontation and hijinks before we'll listen, and once we have it we'll perk our ears for any pointless update. And that's exactly what this election gave us, and that's exactly what we did. And the media companies know it. News programs that already sensationalize their stories to draw in viewers have now seen the potential money to be made from a breakdown our most basic of political mechanics. America's loss is their gain.

It's not about actual politics, because if it were we'd have had more than a 51 percent voter turnout. It's about entertainment, about the perverse gratification of watching strangers butt heads.

Don't take this article as a piece of pissy, jaded fluff. Take it, instead, as an ironic look a year that saw the core institution of our fair country turned into a reality-based television program, and as a plea that we, the up-and-coming minds of America, take our politics more seriously next time around. So, from everyone at the Collegian Arts & Living staff, we say thank you for reading us this year, and we look forward to bringing you the most up-to-date information in the world of entertainment in 2001. Happy Holidays!

Pop-Culture! Music, Napster, Britney and Insults

Welcome to a round table discussion by members of the Collegian Staff about various entertainment issues of this last year. I came up with three questions that I hope touched on the major pop-culture news of 2000 and space constraint-prohibited printing everyone's full responses, but everyone who participated is represented here. Mike Delano

1. Is there an explanation for why 2000 was the worst year for movies in recent memory?

Katie Landers

Well the big issue for movies this year was their big strike. Something about us only wanting to make movies because of stuff like it guess. MONEY. Gimme the Beverly Hills mansion - multiplexes at an all time high. Maybe all actors should get second jobs like waiting tables or babysitting. We did go to see Pokemon 2000 this year. I mean.

Adam Martignetti

I don't know if there's any one explanation why there were so many bad movies this year but I think it's just Hollywood not taking a chance. I mean last year we had such things as American Beauty and Being John Malcovich and Three Kings and even The Matrix. These were all movies that pushed the envelope at least a little bit. Just look at the movies that made a lot of money this year. Scream 3 a sequel. Erin Brockovich fairly tame true story with a lot of Julia Roberts' cleavage. Gladiator was probably the best of this bunch. Mission Impossible 2, a sequel. Perfect Storm. Meet the Parents. The Grinch. I mean these are not great movies by any standards. It just those that the best movies are the ones that are different that make audiences alter their perception. Same sat. I think the best movies of the year. Almost Famous. Wonder Boys and The Virgin Suicides all did this.

Nicholas Pizzolato

It might not necessarily mean that there were just bad movies out there, but it was what Hollywood chose to advertise. Don't get me wrong, I agree that this is one of the worst years for films but I think the biggest culprit is the advertising and selling of movies to the public. Like Adam said as good as Almost Famous, Wonder Boys and The Virgin Suicides were critically, they never got almost no press or support from the box office. Instead they gave us Dr. Seuss' How the Grinch Stole Christmas and Pokemon 2000 this year. I mean.

Bryan McAllister

The summer set the tone for this year - really when Hollywood has a good summer some pretty good independent films sneak out as well. But this summer was completely devoid of anything worthwhile, and Hollywood took a big hit when The Perfect Storm, The Patriot, and Mission Impossible 2 all failed to really excite an audience like previous blockbusters did. Sure they all made money, but all were second rate big movies. Even Gladiator was a just a well done rip-off of Braveheart. The reason for this trend is pretty simple. This is the year when all the rip-offs of previously successful movies came out - so the Perfect Storm is really just a Titanic takeoff and The Patriot is another Braveheart take-off. Luckily, I don't think we've seen the best movies of the year yet. Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon is supposed to be breathtaking and there is always the chance that Cast Away, re-teaming Tom Hanks and Robert Zemeckis, will be the front-running Oscar nominee we're looking for. But I think we're really waiting for the next two years for the big directors to come back with movies... Spielberg, Scorcese, Lucas, and new offerings from Wes Anderson and Spike Jonze. This was a rebuilding year, like the last four Patriots seasons.

David Troupes

At the risk of sounding too jaded, and along the lines of what Nick was saying, I think that Hollywood moneymakers are figuring out that there isn't necessarily any correlation between a movie looking good in a clever and manipulative ad campaign and a movie actually being good. We should all feel lucky that we live so close to Northampton and its small art-house cinemas that get most of the notable independent films, the sort of movies you'd never see playing at one of the 15 screen corporate megaplexes.

Ryan Benharris

Dave's right, the films this year that have looked the best were the worst movies of the year. Mission Impossible 2 is a perfect example of this. They spent so much time making extravagant outrageous scenes that they forgot to actually write a story. The better films of the year, like High Fidelity and Almost Famous did not have any distinct visual appeal, but instead a much more well crafted plot.

Adam Martignetti

Well let's not be so quick to completely separate the Oscars and money. Until last year, when The Insider was nominated for Best Picture, the lowest box office total for any Best Picture nominee was $32 million by Annie Hall in 1977! The films nominated for the big Oscar categories make a lot of money. American Beauty ($130 million), Shakespeare in Love ($100 million), Titanic ($601 million), Braveheart ($75.6 million), Forrest Gump ($329 million). And those are just the Best Picture winners. If you look at the runner-ups, there are things like As Good as It Gets, Good Will Hunting, The Sixth Sense, etc.

Sam Wilkinson

You people are a bunch of cynics. A bad year happens and reading this thing is like reading a death notice - we're all saying boo hoo, there weren't many good movies this year, and no, we aren't going to repeat the last couple of years. But with Croupier (my pick o' da year) and Virgin Suicides among others, it isn't like we just got bitch-slapped by Hollywood. They came up maybe two movies short of what they should and there are a lot of good possibilities around the corner: Traffic? Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon? We don't get good movies for a year and you sound like you're ready to give up - we'll get some in the next month that will make up for this year's slight shortcoming. (And honestly people, Urban Legend: Final Cut?)

Adam Martignetti

It's not like we're two movies short of what we had last year. We're like ten or twelve short of last year. Off the top of my head: Cider House Rules, American Beauty, Fight Club, Three Kings, The Insider, Boys Don't Cry, Girl Interrupted, Being John Malcovich, The Sixth Sense, The Matrix, Eyes Wide Shut, Green Mile and that's without thinking. Beyond Almost Famous, Wonder Boys and The Virgin Suicides, I wouldn't place any other movie this year even in the same vicinity as the ones from last year.

Katie Landers

This summer did have The Patriot and Scary Movie (the funniest movie to come out since Airplane!). A great film that I think everyone is forgetting, probably the greatest movie of all 2000, was Magnolia. The film didn't get nearly as much credit as it deserved. Everyone should sit down and watch this movie. The whole movie pulls together so well and has awesome stories within.

Sam Wilkinson

Woah woah woah. Ignoring this Katie Landers claim that Magnolia is the greatest anything (other than a movie with frogs raining from the heavens) is ridiculous. As the Managing Editor, you are lucky not to have been fired for that, Katie.

Katie Landers:

Gee, Sam. I'm sorry to hear that you disagree with me. Perhaps I could take a pay cut, a demotion to less than writer. But wait, I don't get paid....

2. Was Eminem, Reality TV or Napster the biggest story of the year, and what does it say about the year 2000.

Katie Landers

Napster takes the lead in the most covered entertainment tool this year. Poor college students rely on such a web site to provide some form of free music. Entertainers got their shorts all in a knot because the free distribution of their work might have caused their capital to come down some. There were the greedy Dr. Dre and Metallica who got people booted off the network, such as myself, because their music is such a gold mine and they couldn't afford to lose any more sales. The only freaking song I had was "Nothing Else Matters." With Napster looking like it might be taken over by capitalism, another freedom of the World Wide Web has gone out the door.

Adam Martignetti

I think as college students we're all bound to say Napster. If you looked at the U-Wire or any college newspaper, it seemed like there was always a story about Napster being banned or not or something about Napster. I think we're also all pop-culture savvy. I'm not sure how many people outside our age bracket really got into the whole Eminem situation. If you don't watch MTV, then I don't think you cared. But, he was undoubtedly a master of manipulating the media this year. His album was huge. His image, though, became much bigger. The guy became the male version of Madonna. He managed to stir up so much controversy with the media. Everyday he had a new image. But like I said, I'm not sure he ever made it much beyond people out age. My dad doesn't know Eminem. I'd have to say Reality TV is the biggest story, though. That's what mainstream America fell in love with, which is weird because we've had Real World for a long time now.

Nick Pizzolato

I saw maybe two episodes of Survivor when it first aired during the summer, giving CBS popularity and ratings (two things that it desperately needs) but I wasn't too impressed. But it didn't matter that I didn't see it because everyone was talking about it. Maybe because I have been stuck watching the last eight or so years of Road Rules and The Real World so I wasn't too impressed by the show. Now maybe that's why it was so big, because people weren't able to see the whining and complaining that has existed on both of the MTV shows. I think that this trend shows that our society says that being voyeuristic is creepy and forbidden so all of these shows are sprouting up and succeeding.

As for Slim Shady, as far as I'm concerned despite his great ability to create this alter ego and sell it better than Milli Vanilli, he is perhaps the most overrated artist of this year. Yes, I admit that I like some of his songs. Some of them show great maturity for a sophomore album and also Marshall's ability to tell everyone that he's selling his imagination, acting like a disclaimer for his own album. Songs like "The Way I Am" "Stan", "Drug Ballad", and to an extent his happy pop sounding "The Real Slim Shady" talk about his experience has a role model, a superstar, and a human being. I think that Eminem talks the talk but kind of trips when he tries to walk the walk. He has issues with his own popularity and I

Entertainer of the year:
Jim Carrey

As the Arts and Living Editor, I find myself in the always difficult position of justifying my choices to you for things that I have chosen to fulfill my personal convictions as well as my proof to you that I am a legitimate critic. Since music is my real area of interest, you can see my reasoning behind my choices on the next page.

I have decided to pick Jim Carrey as the entertainer of the year because he has truly dominated the box office once again. His film, The Grinch though it may not tremendous was the first real big hit of the year. This accomplishment comes after he has been routinely been shunned from high-class awards for two years. Because of his perseverance and intense desire to feed the public, he is a noble choice as the year's top artist.

Sam Wilkinson – Managing Editor

Top 3 Films of the year:
Croupier
Nobody saw it. Too bad.
The Original Kings of Comedy
Nobody noticed it. Definitely too bad.
Urban Legend: Final Cut
Ok, realistically, this was the worst film of the year. God was it awful. But it was so awful in such a tasty way.

Top 3 Albums of the year:
Deltron 30/30 – Deltron 30/30
"Criminally underrated," says me. Honestly, this album flew underneath the radar and will end up forgotten, despite it being the best hip-hop album of the year.
Mark Knopfler – Walking to Philadelphia
"Best English guitarist since Clapton," again says me.
Black Eyed Peas – Bridging the Gap
"No explanation needed – but here's one: it's a great party album. Here's another: there are brilliant duets with Wyclef, Mos Def and Macy Gray. Here's a third: it is smooth."
Top 3 Songs of a year:
OutKast – "B.O.B."
Paul Simon – "Darling Lorraine"
Wyclef Jean – "Wish You Were Here"

Top Television show of the year:
The Daily Show with Jon Stewart
Entertainer of the year:
Jon Stewart

Look. There's no need for me to justify my picks to any single one of the other fine people in this page. They are a good crew, solid working staff, so what if they can't make cultural picks worth one damn?

Jon Stewart is the entertainer of the year because his coverage of recent political events was the most honest, most telling, most critical and least fake of all coverage in the media. The reporters that surround him are brilliant and while idling on Comedy Central, they've become the most brilliant political satirists in America. Hands down.

David Troupes – Film Editor

Top 3 Films of the year:
Almost Famous
The Virgin Suicides
Billy Elliot

Top 3 Albums of the year:
Radiohead – Kid A
Smashing Pumpkins – Machina/The Machines of God
PJ Harvey – Stories from the city, stories from the sea

Top 3 Songs of the year:
Radiohead – "How to disappear completely"
U2 – "Stuck in a moment you can't get out of"
The Eels – "Grace Kelley Blues"

Top Television Show of the year:
"The Simpsons"

Entertainer of the year:
George W. Bush and Al Gore

Here's why Kid A is at the top of my list: It is the only album that came out this year which (1) set about exploring brand new territory, with no regard for either popular musical trends or the band's own history, and (2) succeeded completely at this. I can't go into the particulars of its brilliance, but any open-minded listener should be able to appreciate what Radiohead has accomplished.
Machina tried to do this, and almost succeeded, but a couple of weak tracks and sketchy production choices hold them back. The other three albums on my list similarly display this combination of originality and consistency. The new U2 album, by the way, didn't make my list because of its redundancy and lyrical weakness. Still some great songs on it, though.

Knife selling guy on the Home Shopping Club Knife Show

This was a great year for entertainment, especially if you love knives. Although Walter de las Estrellas on the Spanish Channel came close to earning the coveted "Entertainer of the Year" spot, the crazy, tooth-deficient guys on Home Shopping network that yell about knives like the "Galactic Warrior" just had too much steam out of the gate.

There were precious few memorable films this year, assuming we are not mentioning Leprechaun in the Hood. Regardless, watching The In-Crowd with the Collegian Boy Band expert was a memorable experience. For the record, the finest pieces of literature I read this year were various excerpts from the Book of Boo. Have a fun break.

Top Television Show of the year:
"Dawson's Creek"

Entertainer of the year:

I don't think there should be any doubt as to this year's best film. Almost Famous was head and shoulders above anything else. The film had more heart and more compassion than any in recent history. It was superbly cast, well acted, touchingly written and brilliantly directed. I also loved Wonder Boys, even though it received mixed critical success. Tobey Maguire is fast becoming one of my favorite actors and Michael Douglas absolutely MUST get an Oscar nod for his performance here. And despite what some will claim, I do believe that the movie had something fundamental to say about the nature of writing and life. Virgin Suicides: just see it. It's touching and all together innocent and wonderful.

As for the music. In days when 10 and 12 track albums are considered substantial, the Smashing Pumpkins gave us an amazing collection of 15 textured rock songs. Machina is a real testament to the fusion of sound and the, at times, real poetry in Billy Corgan's lyrics that made the band great. It's a travesty that this was not well received. I can honestly say that there are 12 or 13 great songs on the album. When I first heard, The Man Who, I thought it was kind of whiny and annoying. After about two more listens, I fell in love with it. "Driftwood" is amazing. "The Last Laugh of the Laughter" is even more amazing. "Slide Show"- brilliant. This is great Brit-pop with incredible precision and heart. I'll take this over Kid A any day of the week. The Wallflowers deserve credit for not-becoming every other pop band out there. This was the album that surprised me, in a good way, this year. Truly well-crafted and thought-provoking.

"I'm going down, down baby..." not in a Range Rover, but in a blaze of glory. I finally did it – I persuaded the Newsroom to vote for Nelly's "Country Grammar" as song of the year. It might be the one of the dumbest songs I've ever heard, but it's so catchy. I'm not a big fan of pop-rap, but there is something about that song that is aesthetically pleasing.

My album of the year has to be A Perfects Circle's Mer De Noms. I'm a big fan of Tool and Maynard James Keenan, but I winced at the thought of him doing a side project – what was I thinking. it turned out to be musical genius.

As for the other categories, they're all obvious choices for a male sports fan. The Patriot had killing, SportsCenter for the scores and highlights and Eminem because he is ruthless.

This was a damn fine year for music. The outpouring of heavy metal was mind-boggling, but I did my best to sort out the albums of choice. I could easily expand this list to 10 or 15 and not run out of stellar material, but I made my choices and I stick by them. I do want to give honorable mention for great albums to Disturbed, Pantera, Pitchshifter, Dark Tranquility and Iron Maiden, and I could go on.

As for my top songs, I approached that as "top radio songs." These are not my favorite, deeply meaningful album tracks. These are the tunes that made me crank the volume and propel my poor Corolla to top speed whenever they came on. These songs rawk!

Buttercup is the perfect woman, and someday I will marry her.

I must debate the points made by my oh-so-worthy colleagues about the validity of my selections. Let us start with the music industry, where Christiana's assets hold water versus Britney two big hits. Look, I voted Rage's new CD as the tops of the year, for the simple reason that I love them, and the album, and we probably will never get any new music from them since they broke up. At the same time, it is hard to ignore the success of Christina and Britney, and their various clones. The TRL pop queens ripped up the charts, and so I'll bow my head to them for further destroying the ideology that is quality in Pop Culture. But I would be remiss if I didn't point out for all their pop hits, they were outdueled on the charts by Destiny's Child. Yes, the super pop diva's from Texas, who had more members kicked out then pregnated chad ballots in Florida, scorned the charts with multiple hits like, "Say my Name," "Bug-a-Boo" and "Jumpin, Jumpin." Rage tops my list, along with Three Doors Down and Lenny Kravitz Greatest hits, Destiny's Child in forth, and Britney nosing out Christina for fifth.

Two very different opinions on the best music of 2000

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

2000 was a great year for music, as long as you weren't staring at the Billboard charts. Take a look around, though, and there's simply no complaining that music is not as good now as it once was. The radio and television will always be clogged with commercial filler, especially in times of complacency such as these.

The presidential race was a big yawn, people are supposedly enjoying an economic boom, and essentially people don't have much to get excited about, so they shy away from any music that challenges them. That doesn't stop better bands from releasing thought provoking stuff, thankfully, as Radiohead with their amazing kid A and others have shown. So although the mainstream was mostly music that made one want to sit on the lazy boy and fall asleep, 2000 still had it's share of music, that made people stand up and shout.

1. At the drive-in Relationship of Command
Raw energy and passion condensed into a piece of plastic. Relationship of Command somehow captures the mind-blowing live show of the El Paso crew and bottles it for consumption in your car, stereo, wherever. But regardless of the environment, this is music that inspires something inside, and without a doubt is the most amazing record of the year.

2. OutKast Stankonia
After three stellar albums, there was no reason to expect anything but the best from these ATLiens. Hands down the most creative hip-hop of the year, this is just a strong musical statement from extremely talented artists, regardless of genre. Dre and Big Boi make albums as well as they make singles, and everyone's ears are better for it.

3. Deftones White Pony
Their progression to this level of beautifully textured jazz was inevitable, and Moreno's scattershot lyrics and aching wail more than meet the task. They can still rock ("Elite"), but this is a more focused and brilliant Deftones.

4. Phoenix United
Love for the heart of the 80s but none of the cheese that accompanied the decade. Phoenix has a daft mix of old and new. The progression of "Funky Squaredance" is simply a thing of beauty, and these Parisians make sure to remind us that when moving into the future you can't forget the past.

5. Dead Prez Let's Get Free/Mos Def threw out some facts and figures last year with his solo debut about race, economics, and society but Dead Prez brings their rage into a razor-sharp album that puts the race issue in the United States before the Inquisition. Intelligent, lyrical, and intense, these are truly songs to fan the flames of discontent.

6. Groove Armada Vertigo The sonic equivalent of living on a beach watching a sunset with your toes in the sand, this Armada is fine for the dance floor but really shines on laid-back tracks like "At the River" and "Pre 85." If you can't afford an exotic vacation this year, put on the swimsuit, turn up the heat, and spin this.

7. Deltron 3030 Deltron 3030 Uber producer Dan the Automator recruits Del Tha Funkee Homosapien and Kid Koala for his most recent opus, this time a trip to the future where the beats are unmatched and are as far-out as Del's warped slacker flows.

8. The Haunted The Haunted Made Me Do It
There was some good metal this year from Pantera, Iron Maiden, and In Flames, but Sweden's masters are at the top of the heap. Delving's loss is felt, but brutal riffs, intelligent lyrics, and concise length make this easily the most consistent and listenable metal of the year.

9. Nelly Furtado Whoa, Nelly!
Still undefeated as the worst album title of the year, Furtado's debut insonethe-less an exciting and rich work of a singer/songwriter that has an ear for melody. Her lively spirit is just painted all over tracks like "Hey Man!" and "I'm Like a Bird," and the personal and serious nature of some of the subject matter doesn't come close to blunting her enthusiasm.

10. The (International) Noise Conspiracy Survival Sickness From the ashes of Refused comes a Swedish collective with all of the passion and ambition of the former band with a new retro sound that harks back to the Mods and classic British rock.

Constantly finding new ways to present his message of self-worth, creativity, and loathe for capitalist culture, Dennis Lyxzen has found a shiny new vehicle for his burning heart.

1. Eminem – The Marshall Mathers LP – Eminem's album has clearly been the most talked about, most fought over and most important album of the year. Aesthetically it is wonderful. Unfortunately the lyrics are exceedingly awful and it seems that whatever we see from Eminem will only get much, much worse. With three huge singles in "Stan," "The Real Slim Shady" and "The Way I Am," The Marshall Mathers LP has manhandled its way to selling millions of copies. As a rap album, it is one of he best in recent memory. As a social statement, it is an utter shame.

2. OPM – Menace to Sobriety – Though this album did not take off as it probably should have, the one single, "Heaven is a Halfpipe" got some steady play on radio and MTV rotation. The California based group released what is the best "alternative rock, rap, ska, punk…(whatever you want to call it)" record since Sublime's self-titled masterpiece.

3. Matchbox Twenty – Mad season by Matchbox Twenty – After the monstrous success of Yourself or Someone Like You, Matchbox Twenty should have vanished off of the face of the earth forever. Instead, they put out, mad season, a more mature and ultimately better effort than their debut release.

4. David Gray – White Ladder – David Gray is finally getting the respect and recognition that he deserves in the United States. White Ladder was loved by critics and its huge single, "Babylon," grew on music fans of all genres

5. Xzibit – Restless – Though Xzibit waited to release his new album until the tail end of 2000, it will surely become a rap staple throughout next year. Restless seems to be a carbon copy of Eminem's album, but along with all of the negative connotations that go along with "knock-offs," (especially when ripping off Eminem) comes the fact that The Marshall Mathers LP is excellent. Restless takes all of Eminem's best qualities and adds his own experience to make a very good album.

6. Limp Bizkit – Chocolate Starfish and the Hot Dog Flavored Water – You have to listen to this album a lot to like it. The lyrics are stupid and the entire album acts like an open challenge for a fight behind the bike racks after school, but it is fun, and surprisingly easy music to work out and run to. You really do have to listen to it until your ears are bleeding, and you actually think you ARE Fred Durst. After you do that, it becomes quality!

7. Jurassic 5 – Quality Control – Jurassic 5 is one of those groups that you simply cannot dislike. Quality Control is a very unique album, different from much of what the world of hip-hop has ever seen before, highlighted by a spot on this summer's Van's Warped Tour. After speaking to many attendants of the show, they claim that Jurassic 5 was the best act there. They seem to be trying to take rap in a direction away from pop-mainstream, and back towards its original roots', well, quality.

8. Disturbed – The Sickness – Though there is only one song on this album that you will ever hear, and we will surely never see Disturbed ever again, they are easily the best one-hit wonder of 2000. Each time that song was on the radio, I wanted to listen to it, and never got in the least bit sick of it. Plus, I knew every word to "Stupify," and you don't. So that makes me cool

9. Bloodhound Gang – Hooray for Boobies – Bloodhound Gang released what was easily the funniest album of the year. The single, "The Bad Touch," ("Do it like they do on the Discovery Channel!") became a party classic, and the rest of the album is hilarious. Songs like, "Hell Yeah," and "Ballad of Chasey Lain" were lost in the mix, but it will forever be remembered as the wackiest piece of music of the year. For that alone, it deserves some credit.

10. Pearl Jam – Any one of the twenty-five live albums Pearl Jam's 2000 studio release, Binaural was beyond God-awful. It was so incredibly hideous that it made fans of the band vomit out of shear embarrassment. Luckily, in the fall of 2000, the band redeemed itself by releasing twenty-five live albums from their European tour. Each album has excellent quality, and provides a chance for me to answer the question, "what do you want for your birthday/graduation/arbor day/Bunker Hill day gift "Just buy me one of those live Pearl Jam CDs," has become my customary response. I really don't care which one.

Battlebots year's top show

Hey, hey, hey UMass, Tubenotes this week comes from the tag team brains of the television world. No, not Aaron Spelling and David E. Kelley creating their share of rating friendly shows but the Collegian's two very own television correspondents Nick "Cable Box" Pizzolato and Scott "Mystery Science Theater" Newport. Yes, normally we are at odds at each other fighting over the social benefits of pro-wrestling, but for the end of the television season and the year 2000, we have joined forces to give you the faithful, Tubenotes readers (not just our parents) the best of this semester's television.

When one thinks of the best of the best in television for the year, the proverbial cream of the crop, there is one show that can't go without notice. The one and only show that has all on campus, and indeed people across the nation crying for more, that show, Comedy Central's "Battlebots." Does it get any better than seeing grown men using erector sets to create instruments of destruction spanning four individual weight classes? These men are indeed on the cutting edge of destructive Radio Shack technology. Creating such master works as "Disposable Hero," "Bio-Hazard," "ChiaBot" and "Aggressive Polyp," they strike fear into the hearts of viewers, opponents, and Black and Decker belt sanders throughout the television world with weapons that vary from gas powered jackhammers to, in the case of "ChiaBot" plants, powered by natures finest herb garden. These armor-plated go-carts have the ability to wreak havoc upon the other bots in this robotic tournament, much to the delight of the surprising large viewing public. These distant relatives of "The Go Bots" have proven to us, especially with the second season debuting earlier this week, that the general public has not only watched the show, but enjoyed it. Whereas once the show was popular with just a cult following, it has now gained nationwide notoriety, including a character sponsored by Jay Leno who claims that his robot will chin anyone to death. The inherent irony of that is almost too much to bear; you see, Jay Leno has a big chin.

In part, the show's tremendous popularity has to do with our childhood icons, who have all prostituted themselves to Comedy Central to get a spot on their new show. We have all grown up with Bill Nye as the science teacher we didn't ignore, who has a role as the scientific "advisor" to the commentators. Using his undoubtedly Mr. Wizard like expertise to wow us all with such lines as "He hit um' good." Donna D'Errico is a on the go interviewer to the dorky competitors, much to the delight of the surprising large viewing public. Record breaking year makes teenage music pop phenomenon of the year

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Did you hear the angst-driven shriek?

Did you hear the joyous high-pitched squeals?

Recently millions of prepubescent girls fell into a frighteningly mad frenzy while others rejoiced. On November 29, 2000 official Billboard Album chart numbers indicated that the Backstreet Boys' new album Black and Blue had sold a jaw-dropping 1.59 millions copies it's first week out. The number, however, failed to top the record held by rivals 'N Sync, whose sophomore album No Strings Attached sold a staggering 2.4 million units, breaking the all-time first-week sales record of the SoundScan era, leaving fans of the Backstreet Boys to weep and fans of 'N Sync to rejoice.

The Backstreet Boys first started the record-breaking frenzy in May 1999 when the group's second album Millennium sold a whopping 1.13 million copies during its debut week in stores. But after 'N Sync more than doubled that number in March, fans of the Backstreet Boys (not to mention the group itself) were hoping to top that number with Black and Blue.

The Orlando based groups haven't been the only ones smashing record sales this year, as a booming economy and a record 50 million-plus teenagers in America today has led a slew of top artists such as Britney Spears, Eminem and Limp Bizkit to record-setting first week sales.

Shock-rapper Eminem sold 1.76 million copies of the critically acclaimed The Marshall Mathers LP to land the first-week record for a solo artist and the second-highest SoundScan debut ever.

Britney Spears moved 1.3 million copies of her sophomore album Oops!…I Did It Again to become the first-week queen among female artists. The mid-riff baring chanteuse nearly tripled Alanis Morissette's 1998 record for greatest first-week sales by a female artist.

Limp Bizkit topped the rock band heap after fans snapped up 1.03 million copies of Chocolate Starfish and the Hot Dog Flavored Water, securing the loose grip that rock music currently has on the music landscape. Chocolate became the fifth biggest chart entry this year, eclipsing Pearl Jam's Vs. as the biggest rock debut ever.

Besides the economy and a record number of teens, extraordinary publicity setup can be credited for the monstrous numbers. Great first singles, amazing premier videos, impressive marketing techniques, aggressive TV campaigns (not to mention "TRL"), driving power in the biz), innovative online campaigns, and endless press onslaught prior to the release of the albums all helped boost first week sales to phenomenal proportions.

What war's been good for

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

As we near the end of a dismal year of filmmaking, the Collegian arts staff pause and look back, taking into consideration the director's hard work, the cinematographer's skills, and the various nuances of each film.

And then there's me.

Now, I love movies as much as the next red-blooded American, but I just can't hold long debates over Gus Van Sant's choice of camera angles in Good Will Hunting.

And just like every red-blooded American male, I like seeing war movies. This year, Hollywood did give us some pretty good war movies but I only think that three of them really make it into consideration for "Best Damn War Movie 2000." Just a word of warning to those of you who read my articles but don't know me: I take my war movies seriously. I know my stuff, and I expect the directors to know it too.

The first movie up for the BDWM award is Gladiator. I know – many consider it an epic, and people point to the beginning Germanic battle as the only war scene. Sadly, these people are unskilled in the art of combat, and little do they realize that its not that one scene puts in into consideration as a war movie. If a war scene were the only qualifying factor, then Forrest Gump would be a Vietnam movie.

The other war scene, which some folks can disagree with me on, but I really don't care, is the battle reenactment. In that scene, the gladiators are supposed to die, but many to gain the tactical and military edge and defeat their opponents. If they were just fighting for their lives, that's one thing. But showing up an emperor in front of countless people? A whole new arena.

These two scenes, when added to the splendid single combat scenes, make Gladiator a top contender for BDWM of 2000. Special points for the decapitation scene.

Now I have a confession to make, I'm a Navy fan. I was planning on enlisting if I didn't get into college. I've been on carriers, destroyers, battleships, transports even a Russian missile cruiser once. But the coolest boat I was ever allowed on was the Balao Class USS Lionfish, a World War Two submarine.

You step into this thing and immediately you're claustrophobic. It's a tin can with a periscope.

I got the same feeling watching U-571.

This movie was amazing. As far as historical accuracy goes though… I'm sorry, but I'm not sure I exactly buy the movie's theory that if you take an American crew and put them on a German sub, they'll know how to drive it. Some people might say hey, a boat's a boat, but these people are idiots. Fortunately, it is very easy to ignore this fact, and get lost in the story of an American crew desperately trying to return home.

Minus two points for casting Jon Bon Jovi, but overall a great movie.

The last real war movie of the year in contention is The Patriot. This movie is horrible for historical accuracy, although it does get points for accurately showing the effects of artillery in Napoleonic combat. First of all, that first ambush scene, while absolutely amazing, is utterly ridiculous once examined in the cold hard light of historical fact. I often hear that The Patriot is simply Braveheart in America, but I have to disagree. Braveheart, while in its own right a great movie although completely wrong, it is more the story of a man fighting for revenge. In The Patriot, the fight is about protecting a man's home.

It is still pro-American propaganda (not that I'm complaining) but the main problem I have with The Patriot is the fact that Mel Gibson's character plays yet another general-captain-soldier-flag bearer all at the same time. These characters pop up so often in war movies with no good reason it's silly: Michael Caine in Zulu, Matthew Broderick in Glory – don't get me started on Glory – and the list goes on. Fortunately for you, I'll stop here.

I think the big winner for Best Damn War Movie of 2000 goes to U-571. It holds no candle to other sub movies such as Das Boot and The Enemy Below but is one of the few bright spots for 2000. I'll retreat now into my comfy but functional flak jacket and change the oil in my Sherman tank.

Recapping the worse events at UMass

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

5. The re-done Worcester Dining Hall

It has the same food, only now it's twice as busy, has less seating, the silverware is in stupid buckets, there're never any plates, and the cappuccino machine is always broken. Hey, at least it's pretty to look at when you're standing up eating your southern fried steak with your hands, right?

4. The camera in Southwest

So, not only do we get to feel that our privacy and rights are being constantly violated (because even if it isn't true, we feel that way), but we don't even get the advantages of greater safety since the camera shuts off during power outages and, when functional, provides such a high-quality image that an observer couldn't differentiate between a person wearing a tuxedo and a nudist with a massive penis.

3. The Chancellor overrides the 30-pack beer rule

The SGA finally does something that helps a large number of students and has it revoked by the baddest, quittingest Scot on the planet. Allowing students to have 30-packs of beer in the dorm eliminates so many problems for 21-year-olds who could now bring in the most widely-available packaging of alchohol and for RAs who would no longer have to enforce an antiquated rule. Too bad it's poor public relations for our kiss-all-parents'-asses administration. (P.S. If this was a best-of-the-year list, the Chancellor leaving would definitely be on there.)

2. Privitization

Starbucks, anyone? So, the supposed benefits of selling ourselves out to big business basically some cown to a cup of coffee that's way more expensive than the Bluewall, over-priced CDs in the UStore, and an almost totally unchanged Textbook Annex? Awesome. If we were going to be sluts, at least we could have gotten something out of it.

1. The Rape Winter, and subsequent forgetting of

This past winter, when fear was rampant and paranoia ran high, sucked. The number of reported incidents was rising and so were the rumors and, true or not, people believed them. Women felt like potential victims and men felt like they were being unfairly accused just by being out on campus at night. It was definitely the worst thing to happen to UMass in a long time, perhaps ever. Perhaps the only thing nearly was bad as the Rape Winter was the fact that almost no one remembers it anymore. It was only a few months ago, but once again women are walking around campus at midnight alone, no one is taking safety precautions, and people act as though nothing ever happened here. It's a lie. The only good that could ever have come of the Winter was an increased awareness and an increase in people taking care of themselves, but that hasn't happened.

Kurt "the Expert" Polesky picks the best videos

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

Welcome to the first annual UMass Daily Collegian 2000 Music Video Awards, honoring the very best and worst in music video this past year. Your hosts for the evening are Chancellor Scott and Ol' Dirty Bastard. All of the stars have arrived and are already totally hammered, so let's get the show underway.

Best Rock Video
Your presenters are Jessie Camp and Raymond from MTV. At one point the rock video was the impetus for the cultural phenomenon that was MTV and music video. Today, in many waysm it is the forgotten genre, at least in terms of MTV. If you're lucky enough you might catch "Return of the Rock" on at 5:30 in the morning, but for the most part Carson Daly and the prepubescent screams of 14 year-old girls have replaced Rikki Rachman and "The Headbangers Ball." However, in the midst of all this 2000 still managed to produce some rock videos that really rocked. Here are the nominees:
Limp Bizkit, "Rollin"
Rage Against The Machine, "Testify"
Rage Against The Machine, "Sleep Now In the Fire"
Deftones, "Back in School"
Papa Roach, "Last Resort"

And the winner is…Rage Against The Machine, "Testify." As much as my goal in life is to suck up to Fred Durst at every opportunity just like Carson Daly, I still had to go with Zack and his crew for Best Rock Video. A truly rockin' video with some brash political statements, and it was pretty damn funny, too. Plus Michael Moore, the god of the UMass Communications department, directed it.

Best Teen Pop Award
Your presenters are Danny Wood from New Kids on the Block and that guy with the facial hair from 98 Degrees. 2000 was truly a banner year for teen pop music. Dominating "TRL" and record sales alike, the genre continued to explode and was probably more dependant on the music video than any other kind of music. Here are the nominees:
*NSYNC, "Bye Bye Bye"
*NSYNC, "It's Gonna Be Me"
Christina Aguilera, "Come on Over"
Britney Spears, "Oops I Did it Again" together, "The Hardest Part of Breaking Up"

And the winner is…*NSYNC, "Bye Bye Bye." This was a tough choice since I have much love for Christina and Britney and I personally think 2gether is hilarious. Mad props to QT by the way. But I have to go with "Bye Bye Bye" simply because it is probably the single most emulated dance by 14 year-old girls and drunken 20 year-old guys of all time. By the way, a friend of mine tells me that if you look closely in the Britney video you can see a little bit more than you are supposed to see if you know what I mean. But that's just a rumor.

Best Hip-Hop Video
Your presenters are Kid from Kid and Play and Martha Stewart. With new releases by Eminem, Wu Tang, Jay-Z, Ja Rule, OutKast, Cash Money, and countless others, plus some phat jams out of St. Lonie by a guy named Nelly, and some solid singles off Dre's Chronic 2000, and DMX's 1999 release, 2000 was a banner year for hip-hop. The great variety resulted in some truly hot videos. Here are the nominees:
Eminem, "The Real Slim Shady"
Eminem, "Stan"
Wu-Tang Clan, "Gravel Pit"
OutKast, "B.O.B."
DMX, "Party Up"
And the winner is…OutKast, "B.O.B." A truly psychedelic and creative-looking video from two of hip-hop's most original MCs, who are just so fresh and so clean.

Worst Video of The Year
No presenters for this award, sorry. This award goes to the type of video that just makes you cringe when you see it. And 2000 had quite a few of them. Whether it is some egomaniac guy pretending he be Jesus or three guys barking, 2000 certainly had its share of bad videos. And the nominees are:
Baja Men, "Who Let The Dogs Out?"
Britney Spears, "Lucky"
Creed, "With Arms Wide Open"
Jagged Edge, "Let's Get Married"

And the winner is…Creed, "With Arms Wide Open." Get hold of yourself Scott Stapp, you're not the second coming of Christ – at least I don't think so. Watching this video led me to believe that Stapp is convinced he is some kind of biblical figure. He also sounds constipated when he sings.

Best Video Nobody Cared About: Fastball, "You're an Ocean"

Not much MTV play for this video. Come to think of it, I only saw it on MTV2 and CTN. The video is something off the typical beaten path, and is a good representation of Fastball's unique and somewhat corny style.

Worst Video Everybody Cared About: Red Hot Chili Peppers, "Californication"

Settle down Chili Pepper fans, not everybody worships this video. The song was tired and bland, and the video was overrated. A video game theme…yay. It's not that the video was bad, I just don't think it was nearly as creative as it was hyped to be and the song itself is a cure for insomnia.

Best Cheesy Video: Eiffel 65, "Blue (Da Ba Dee)"

If you've seen it you know what I mean.

Most Embarrassing Moment of the Year on MTV: Britney Spears' live performance of "Lucky" during MTV "All Access Week"

For all you people who said Britney is a no talent lip-syncher, judging by this performance, you are right. Who ever conceived of the choreography for this number was obviously on acid at the time. What the hell was up with the dancing sailors? By far the worst live performance in the history of music.

And finally, my own special category.

Worst "Music Video" in a TV Commmercial: Ioe. "I Wanna Know" in a McDonalds Commercial

This commercial features Ioe singing his hit summer single "I Wanna Know" outside of a McDonalds of all places. Meanwhile, all of the diehard Ioe fans are throwing their hands in the air and waving 'em like they just don't care. This is all good except for one thing: their hands are full of McDonalds food. As they get their groove on with Ioe they are passionately waving around Quarter Pounders, Big Macs, McChicken Sandwiches, and whatever other McDonalds food they can get their filthy hands on. In a related story, Ioe's Album I Wanna Know is now available with a side of large fries and a medium drink for a limited time only. Or you can Supersize it for only 55 cents more. In a normal year, Sinqo's Pepsi commercial where he sang the ghetto anthem "Joy of Cola" would have won it, but thanks to Ioe this was no normal year.

That's it for the First Annual UMass Daily Collegian Video Awards show. Drive home safely. Don't worry even if you've been drinking, since the car will "operate itself."

think in the next year, if he doesn't get shot you will see him transform more as a free speech advocate as he produces more albums, that are still offensive to his critics but to those that don't hate him with a passion will without a doubt continue to buy and support him.

Bryan McAllister
Wow, tough call. All three were pretty big even if I'm sick and tired of Eminem and "Survivor." In that case, I'm going with Napster. First of all, I just like saying Napster. It's one of those words you can say over and over and never get tired of, like "elongate." Elongate elongate elongate. See what I mean? In all seriousness, Napster represents the take-over of the Internet into our lives. It almost has seamlessly been integrated into our culture. Ten years ago – maybe less – you never heard of email. Now, I check my mail like 18 times a day. The passing of Information electronically is not only the story of the year, it's a cultural revolution, and the argument over the cost and management of this tool will dominate our culture in the next few years.

David Troupes
I've never liked Metallica's music and their massive egoism doesn't give me much of a reason to like them as people, but I give them my total support in trying to put an end to the trading of copyrighted music, theirs and other artists'. The argument that they already have truckfulls of money is worthless; although the gesture would be nice, they have no obligation to start giving their music away after some arbitrary income level has been met. Many critics say that Napster has the potential to open up unknown artists to large new audiences, and I couldn't agree more. It should be up to the artist, however, and not some kid with a CD-to-mp3 ripping program. If a small-time band wants to spread some songs around the net for publicity, they should be able to do so, and if an established band wants to sell their music in stores, and only in stores, they should also be able to do so.

It is reality-based television, however, that most frightens me, and which I therefore choose as the largest news item of the year. Simply put, voyeurism should not be getting this sort of legitimacy. Live your own lives, America.

Adam Martignetti
And to coincide with what Bryan was saying, it was the Internet that started all this stuff. I mean web cams and porn sites and what not. The Internet is just filled with this kind of stuff and being able to view it online, in the privacy of one's own home, only increased its consumption. Really, the Internet is all about inconspicuous voyeurism. This Reality TV thing is just a way to polish, package and sell it to mainstream America.

Sam Wilkinson
Dave Troupes, I love you to death, but for you to rail against Metallica's massive ego while being a balls-to-the-wall supporter of the Smashing Pumpkins amounts to being, as one Ben Affleck put it, "suspect." Honestly. But biggest and best entertainment of the year? Presidential election. Think Napster, Reality TV and Eminem got press? It doesn't even compare.

3. How does the rise of female stars like Christina Aguilera, Britney Spears, and others relate to the increasingly misogynist rap and rock music?

Katie Landers
I can see how Christina Aguilera and Britney Spears attract the attention that they do. Although some females disagree with the look and sound of the teeny-bopper movement, they do represent the Barbie Doll image that America pressures its girls to be. They become prime targets for musical attack by rappers such as Eminem. Rap and Rock music with its misogynistic tone can exist because, hell, if Dre is in the background throwing a beat, it sounds good so there'll be listeners. Just don't try and get his music off Napster.

Adam Martignetti
Wow, that's a tough question. I didn't expect to be delving deep into social commentary for this thing. I think the way that these teenybopper idols like Britney Spears and Christina Aguilera are held up becomes sickening for some people. They're splashed across every dumb teen magazine, they're on MTV 24-7, they're all over the place. I think that was really what Eminem was trying to say. I think to some degree the misogynist rap and rock is kind of the backlash to that. Of course, that doesn't make it excusable. I just think that people like Fred Durst and Eminem are angry white teenagers in adult bodies. I hate to make this comparison, but a lot of what caused the Columbine shooting and these other suburban white middle class shootings can be seen in their music. There are people in that social strata that are seriously discontented and it's being expressed either by shootings or, in this case, misogynist lyrics. I also think it comes down to sex. I mean the main media message coming out of the Britney/Christina thing is that sex sells. And unfortunately, these lyrics coincide with that message. It's unfortunate. In addition, I'm not sure if I made this clear before, but Magnolia is a triumph of American cinema.

Bryan McAllister
I agree with Adam in a sense, although I don't agree that misogynist rap and rock is a backlash to the teen girl singers. In fact, I think Adam hits the nail on the head when he says the misogynist lyrics coincide with the Britney/Christina message. That's what's so disturbing. They're working together on this. Maybe not literally, but it's no secret that the creators behind Britney (and probably Christina) are men. They're carrying out their little schoolgirl fantasies about how girls should be like.

David Troupes
The music being, as Brian says, largely orchestrated or influenced by record company execs and dollar-sign-eyed producers, offers teenagers hyperbolic versions of what they think they should be. Christina is an ultra-feminized, ultra-sexualized teenage girl, and Fred Durst is an ultra-masculinized, ultra-jockified teenage boy.

Nick Pizzolato
I agree, the way that Britney and Christina allow themselves to be advertised to pre-teen and young teenage girls is more terrible than the one song that Eminem might sing implicating them in a sexual act. Everyday on every show and in every song they both sell themselves as the dream girl, what every girl wants or should aspire to be and what every boy fantasies about. I think it's ironic that the same parents that claim that Limp Bizkit, Eminem, Dr. Dre, and other rap and rock acts objectify women (and whose to say they don't) are the same parents that are looking for more music like Britney and Christina, who are telling their kids to be sexual even if they are not saying it.

However, I don't agree that the music this year or recently has been increasingly misogynist when it comes to popular rock and rap acts. Perhaps even more offensive are hair bands like Guns 'N Roses, Warrant, Alice Cooper, and Poison. Songs like "Cherry Pie," "I Loved Her That's Why I Had to Kill Her," "Feed my Frankenstein," and "Skinny Bop" were way more offensive than songs (that weren't written by Eminem) released this year. I'm not saying it's all right or acceptable, but comparatively I wouldn't say that music is becoming more misogynistic.

Sam Wilkinson
Suggesting, even for a moment, that Britney and Christina represent some sort of artistic or female nadir is ridiculous – they are both images, like Brian said. They are pipedreams, racks of meat for young men, horrific role models for young women. The fact that they are the "representatives" of women's music is insulting by it's very nature.

At the same time, suggesting music is somehow more misogynistic now than before? Ridiculous. Music has always been misogynistic in one way or another. The Pizz is absolutely right – there are always songs that are embarrassing to the male gender and down right insulting to women. That's part of music, unfortunately.

Ryan Benharris
I think Sam is overlooking something very important about Christina and Brittney. To their audience, which is made up of four billion young girls, they are not only the most artistic artists around, but also their role models. In comparison to that, we see the same idolization of teenage boys to people like Eminem, Limp Bizkit and Korn. The fact that both fads are co-existing is quite remarkable. I think it says a lot about Christina and Britney's ability to act as legitimate artists. Overlooking the fact that their music sucks, they are redefining what it means to be a female musician in a dangerously violent male dominated music world.

Sam Wilkinson
As critiques Ryan, we have no obligation to support what is popular – we have an obligation to review what is good. Hence, Christina and Britney? They are awful. And don't give them credit Ryan. They are two girls who are half popular because they are bathroom entertainment for men. That isn't redefinition or a fight against a dangerous male world – it's playing right into it.

Katie Landers (the FINAL WORD)
Now me being the lone female of this whole conversation, and an added bonus that I am always right, I will get the last word here. Magnolia was the best film of the year (editor's note–no it wasn't and you are seriously jeapordizing your job if you keep this insipid talk up), even though it came out in the end of last December. I am most grateful that this year has come to an end, and this semester is finally over. Hopefully next year will have some better choices of entertainment. Good luck with Finals!!!

- Though I would love to give the final word away, I learned from Clerks that my title dictates my behavior. As the Arts & Living Editor, I can honestly say that it has been a packed year of issues in entertainment. Thank you very much to all of the participants.

Minutewomen end skid with victory over UNH

Liivandi scores career-high 15; UMass allows season-low 39 points

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Before the season even started, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Jamie O'Brien peered at the upcoming schedule and saw this: Wed. 12/13/00, at New Hampshire, 7:00 p.m.

At that point, she felt the game was a "should win."

UMass	56
New Hampshire	39

What O'Brien didn't figure into the Minutewomen equation was that her squad would drop the four games (San Francisco, Stanford, James Madison, Rutgers) prior to the Wildcat match up.

Yesterday, as the Maroon and White took its customary pre-game warm-up, O'Brien stood on the sideline, faced with a must-win situation. Her team responded, overcoming an early second half lapse to beat New Hampshire by a decisive 17 points, 56-39 at the standstill-ly Lundholm Gymnasium in Durham.

"This is a game we had to have," O'Brien said. "You've got teams on the schedule you feel like you need to beat and this was one of those games ... especially when we struggled the last few games. This was just a must game for us."

Sophomore forward Siiri Liivandi's career-high 16 points led the Minutewomen. Liivandi shot an impressive 5-for-7 from the field while going a perfect 5-for-5 from the charity stripe.

"We were struggling offensively and she made a couple good moves in the first half to keep us in there and get us a little bit of a lead and then she played very, very well down the stretch. That's what we needed her to do – hit some big buckets, knock down some free throws. She's starting to feel a little bit more comfortable."

Freshman Paige Harris (4-for-6 FG, 2-for-3 three pointers) and sophomore Jen Butler added ten points in the victory.

Hen[']s got two twisted ankles and that little knee situation she has," O'Brien said. "I think she's feeling the affects of those things. And she's a tough kid who won't say anything. She keeps trying to fight through it but she just hasn't had the bounce in her step in a while. She had a little more [today]. I think she just really said 'look, I just have to suck it up and give my team what they need."

The win, which ended the Maroon and White's four-game losing streak upped its record to 4-5. The loss dropped the Wildcats mark to a mere 3-6.

UMass had a ten-point lead after the first half, 21-17. That lead, however, was quickly erased to four after only 48 seconds. The score fluctuated back and forth between the two squads for a while until Harris drilled a three to bring the Minutewoman lead to seven, 36-29 with just under 12 minutes left in the contest.

Sophomore Taylore Jarvis's lay-up capped a four-minute, 6-2 Wildcat run to bring the count back to 38-35 with 8:07 remaining.

After the Jarvis hoop, the Minutewomen made a blatant effort to slow the pace of the game down and gain some composure, an attempt to alter the then-turnover prone offense. An 8-0 run ensued.

To end the surge, Cleo Foster lobbed a pass to Slumping UMass in need of win vs. BU

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

If there was ever a team that needed a win, it would be the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

The Minutemen have gotten off to their worst start in almost 20 years at 1-6, and desperately need some confidence before the Atlantic 10 portion of their schedule begins.

When it travels to the Walter Brown Arena in Boston for today's 7 o'clock matchup with the Boston University Terriers, UMass will finally get a chance to pick up a victory against a team that should be clearly inferior.

However, taking BU lightly would be a costly mistake, the Maroon and White can ill afford to make.

"We've had a tendency to [self-destruct] and that's why we are 1-6," Head Coach James "Bruiser" Flint said after his team fell to UConn, 82-67, in last Tuesday's game at the Hartford Civic Center. "But we have to bounce back and be ready for Thursday."

In the game against the No. 11 Huskies, Monty Mack was able to total only three points, and the rest of the Maroon and White failed to significantly pick up the slack.

Despite the fact that this continued a streak of sub-par shooting performances for the two-guard, it has not been completely his fault. So far this season, teams have been keying on Mack and making sure that he gets very few good looks at the basket.

UConn was able to do this better than any team Massachusetts has faced this season, double-teaming Mack just about every time he touched the ball and forcing him to take some tough shots.

Monty has to know that defenses are going to

The keys to victory: how to spell a 'win'

In basketball, much like in other big sports, it seems like everyone's an expert.

Even the most casual fans won't hesitate to throw in their two cents about what a team is doing wrong or how it can improve. So in the spirit of the armchair coach, here are a few tips for the Massachusetts men's basketball team to get back on the winning track tonight against Boston University.

1. POWER INSIDE – The players all say the same thing: UMass must play inside-out basketball to win. But even when the Minutemen get the ball into the hands of paint monsters Kitwana Rhymer and Micah Brand, they usually go up too soft and are either blocked or fouled. Instead of dunk-and-ones, the Minutemen end up shooting free throws that they too often miss.

Attack the hoop, gentlemen. Forget the fadeways and hooks; hold the ball up high and go strong to the rim. Instead of making pivots like Ohio State's Ken Johnson and Connecticut's Justin Brown look like All-Pros, you'll get the opposition in foul trouble and score easy, spirit-lifting buckets. Happy hammering.

2. USE YOUR SCREENS – With all apologies to Monty Mack, the opposition has seen enough film to know that UMass runs essentially one play – a circular stagger-screen to Mack, usually at the left elbow. UConn used a simple double-team rotation to shut the off-guard down completely, which should prove once and for all that it's time to rethink the attack.

ADAM WHITE

How about coming off those screens and using the dribble to attack the lane and draw the defense? Instead of just looking for a window to chuck through, Mack could blow by his first man and lay it down for his big guys underneath.

A few easy hoops like that would then open things back up for outside shots, giving Mack and fellow guard Shannon Crooks an opportunity to capitalize on their range.

That goes for Jonathan DePina as well. Instead of backing up off picks like you usually do (and allowing your defender to catch up to you) how about slicing off them into the lane? You're fast enough, and a good enough passer, that you should be able to draw defenders and find

Minutemen travel to Maine for pivotal conference game

JARET BARR/COLLEGIAN
Junior goalie Mike Johson has been playing better as of late after a rocky start to the 2000-01 campaign.

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

Coming off one of its most impressive wins of the season, a 3-1 victory over No. 9 Providence College, the Massachusetts hockey team will look to continue its winning ways when they make the six-hour trek North to take on Maine.

The victory for the Minutemen was their first in nearly a month, a span that saw the Maroon and White drop seven-of-eight games with a tie against Connecticut sandwiched in between.

In the Providence game, UMass (4-10-2, 4-3-0 Hockey East) did some things well that it had not been doing during the winless streak.

It killed penalties – the Friars went 0-for-6 and were limited to only a few quality chances with the man advantage. The Minutemen, before the matchup had been surrendering power play goals at a feverish pace (27 tallies in 101 opportunities).

The Maroon and White made the best of their scoring chances, first when junior sniper Martin Miljko dented the twine on a rebound off of his own one-timer. UMass also scored on a picture-perfect goal when R.J. Gates slammed home a pass from Samuli Jalkanen.

Now on the heels of a crucial victory the Minutemen have one of the most daunting tasks of its season in their single-game with the Black Bears at Alfond Arena.

Maine, a traditional powerhouse and defending Hockey East tournament champions are in the midst of two-game losing skid with both losses coming to Boston University and Boston College. The pair of losses has dropped the Black Bears to 6-6-4 on the 2000-01 campaign.

But the sub-par start to one of last year's Frozen Four participants is not the only thing that has the fans in Orono worried. Their leader, Head Coach Sean Walsh was diagnosed with cancer earlier in the year and missed the Black Bear's first four games because of his illness. In the quartet Maine was 1-1-1 (the fourth game does not count toward the record as it was against the U.S. Development Team).

The Black Bears are led by goaltender Matt Yeats. The junior has appeared in nine games so far and has a goals against average of 2.17. For his heroic efforts in net he has posted a 5-2-1 record.

Offensively, Maine is being paced by Chris Heisten. The sophomore has two goals and has assisted on 10 others in his 14 games of play. The Black Bears were without their most potent scoring threat in Niko Dimitrakos, who was sidelined, with an injury, for the team's first nine games. Since his return to the lineup the Somerville native has scored three goals and added five assists. The junior was formerly a teammate of Minutemen Mike Warner and Scott Horvath at Avon Old Farms.

Warner scored an empty net goal in the win over Providence and has been an integral part of the Minuteman freshman core this season.

UMass will again go with one of the two members of the dynamic duo in goal. Markus Helanen is coming off a 36-save performance in the win over the Friars and Mike Johnson has been playing better after a less than stellar start to the season.

Miljko and senior captain Jeff Turner lead the Minutemen. The two have combined for 28 points with Miljko posting seven goals and seven assists and Turner with five goals and nine assists to his credit.

This is the first game in a pivotal two-game set for the Minutemen, as they will try to not go winless in the non-conference schedule when they play host to Brown University at the Mullins Center on Jan. 30.

Toughest competition of the year

By Melissa Shattuck
Collegian Staff

"Deprived of basic comforts, exposed to the harsh natural elements, your fate at the mercy of strangers...who would you become?"

That's the catch phrase that ignited the nation, forcing them to drop all of their plans on Wednesday nights this summer to catch this year's best television show, "Survivor."

It all started when 16 castaways were taken to a remote tropical island with absolutely nothing. Their goals were to create an island society, gather food, provide shelter and win contests.

Win contests? To make the viewing of "Survivor" even more enjoyable every week there were two kinds of contests. Reward contests, surprisingly enough, rewarded the winning castaway. Some of the winners were able to do things such as call home, create a video for their family to watch, or maybe even a night out on the town. The other contests added an element of excitement to the show. Immunity challenges provided the winner with the opportunity to stay on the island. Many times the immunity challenge fouled up the contestant's master plans. They would then actually have to vote for someone they liked to get kicked off the island.

If this is not quality entertainment I don't know what is. I couldn't wait to sit down and see who was going to be kicked off the island.

What impressed me was the intense drama each week. People were fighting and alliances were being formed. I sat at the edge of my couch each and every week.

Clearly the best part of each episode was when the castaways met for the Tribal Council. Each member was given a torch and they sat around as their supposed friends voted each other off the island. You could cut the tension with a knife.

And then there were two. Who would win, Kelly or Richard? In the final vote all of the castaways were brought back to determine who would be the $1million winner. Richard was pretty confident that he would be the winner.

"I've got the million dollar check written in my name," he said on the first day of production.

The nation sat huddled around their television screens. People were at bars, throwing "Survivor" theme parties, and dropping everything they had scheduled so they could be a part of one of the most highly anticipated television events of the year.

It is obvious that this innovative television show is the best show of the year. Not only was it interesting and captivating, it was addictive. Viewers had to get their weekly dose of "Survivor."

Perhaps the highlight of "Survivor" was being able to go to work and discuss it on Thursday morning. Everyone loved to share his or her views about how unfair it was that so and so got kicked off the island. "Survivor" was the key to the social scene.

Or maybe the best part about "Survivor" is that it's over. But wait, luckily "Survivor: The Australian Outback," is set to begin in 2001.

junior Caroline Nehls who was wide-open underneath the basket. Her lay-up extended the Minutewoman lead to 46-35. From there on in, matters were academic for UMass.

"The offense, the second half – we slowed down just a little bit, got ourselves a little bit more composure and made some shots," O'Brien said. "We still made too many mistakes, too many unforced turnovers. That's something we have to clean up. Hopefully this little Christmas break will get our legs back under us a little bit."

At the outset, UMass was able to sprint to an early 8-2 lead. Senior Kathy Cosner's trey brought the Maroon and White advantage to 14-10 but on the next possession, Wildcat freshman Kate Hennessey (five points) matched Cosner with a three-bomb to bring her squad to within a point at 14-13. Two possessions later, Hennessey pulled up again from the hardwood depths (but her foot was on the line) to give New Hampshire the 15-14 lead with 5:10 to play.

UMass then made a 13-2 run behind good shooting, a great inside presence and solid defense to take a 27-17 lead.

"We came out and we played hard," O'Brien said. In the first half we played a little out of control, but that intensity we'll take. We only gave up 19 points at halftime so our defense was pretty solid.

Harris and Amber Sneed (nine points) hit consecutive three-pointers, upping the score to 20-15. About a minute later, Liivandi found Butler on the block for the eventual hoop and the foul to up the count to 23-17. UMass then put its full-court press on the Wildcats and freshman Cleo Foster wound up with one of her two steals on the day. That play would end in a successful baby hook by Sneed, UMass last score of the half.

The Wildcats would lay one in right before the buzzer sounded to bring the score to 27-19.

come out gunning for him," said Winston Smith. "The rest of us have to know that too and step up and execute on offense."

Another problem the Maroon and White is having is that there seems to be a new dilemma to solve after every game. Flint's squad just recently started making some free throws and getting some rebounds, just to see inconsistent play and poor defense doom it against Ohio State, Providence and UConn.

Although there has not been one key problem to look at, and although a wide variety of things have stopped the team from putting together a complete game on both sides of the ball, some UMass members are hoping that they can learn from all of their mistakes.

"We can learn something from every one of these games," said Jameel Pugh, who garnered his first playing time of the season against the Huskies and electrified the crowd with two crazy dunks. "After a while the score doesn't matter; it's whether or not you are playing hard and doing the right things."

The Terriers come into today's game riding a two game winning streak, and hope to continue their good fortune against the Minutemen. BU has totaled five wins on the year to go along with a pair of losses and is coming off big America East wins against Northeastern (79-72) and Maine (79-67).

Paul Seymour has led the offense for Dennis Wolff's squad thus far, averaging 19.0 points per game. This is good enough for fourth best in the America East, but he is not the only Terrier that can score. Matt Turner (10.5 ppg), Jason Grochowalski (9.8 ppg) and Ryan Butt (8.8 ppg) all compliment Seymour on the offensive end of the floor.

From the outside, Seymour and Turner can both light it up shooting 42 and 32 percent from behind the arc, respectively. UMass will also have to be wary of Shilpi Dhondt, a native Belgian who just dropped 18 points on Maine.

As far as rebounding goes, Butt leads the team, averaging 5.8 boards per game while Seymour contributes 5.5 rpg of his own.

■ keys

the open man once you get free.

Otherwise, you're doing no good, just dribbling back and forth across the top of the key.

3. GET MORE CREATIVE – This is sort of a continuation of No. 2. Why not diagram a few more plays that get people other than Mack a designed shot? OSU coach Jim O'Brien noted after his team's win over UMass that even though forward Winston Smith is a capable scorer, he gets little attention defensively because the Minutemen don't run any plays to him.

Setting up shots for Mack's supporting cast would effectively spread the opposing defense, making the UMass attack more multi-dimensional and allowing Mack some better looks and less double-teams.

Great coaches are known for maximizing the talent of their entire roster. By getting Smith, Crooks and freshman Willie Jenkins some planned shots, UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint could prove his roundball mastery even as he makes his team more dangerous on the offensive end.

4. PRESS, FOR GOD'S SAKE – The team has enough young, well-conditioned bodies that it should be pressing constantly, not just when it's down by double-digits late. Sure it'll take a lot more substitutions, but it worked wonders against the Huskies in garbage time Tuesday night and seems perfectly suited for the quick hands and feet of guys like Crooks, DePina, Jenkins and Jackie Rogers. Even Brand can run the floor surprisingly well for a big man.

Yes, it will take a lot of work in regards to substitutions and foul management. But guys like Ronell Blizzard and Dwayne Early are doing no good whatsoever rotting away on the UMass pine, and both possess the athleticism to lend a big helping hand defensively.

The problem is that in order to press, you've got to score. There's no substitute for just plain putting the ball in the hoop, and there isn't much of a secret to that.

Ending the semester in style: From Livestock Judging scandal to Dwarf tossing with attitude

If you didn't know – this is the last Collegian of the Fall semester. We here in "Third and 48" land find it fitting that, during the winter break, the only thing you'll remember about UMass is how this column changed your life...

To our devoted readers, thank you. You're the reason we print this column every Thursday. Expect the same from us next semester. To our mothers and fathers, thank you for raising us right and giving us the strength to talk to shady characters like Larry the porn guy and Bub, the ostrich chef. And of course, as always, we'd like to thank God.

The Livestock Judging National Championship scandal. Ostrich Racing/Cooking. Wife Carrying. Badminton. Cricket. New York Pumpkin Chucking. College Rodeo. Inner-Tube Alcohol Consumption. Mascot Training. Bowling. Jump Roping. Archery. Motel Swimming (on location). Larry from the porno store. Craig from the gym. We've seen (and heard) it all this semester.

Hint: If all of these topics sound familiar to you, then you're an official "Third and 48" aficionado. We're making t-shirts in the spring. Make sure you inquire about them next semester.

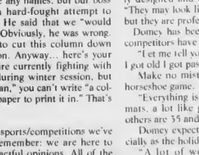
Let it be known that this column is printed every week in the eye of our many critics down here in the Campus Center Basement. We won't give any names, but our boss (not Mike Kobylanski) made a hard-fought attempt to make this a bi-weekly column. He said that we "would never be able to fill the space." Obviously, he was wrong. Some weeks, we actually had to cut this column down because of excess of information. Anyway... here's your last 48er of the semester. We are currently fighting with the same man to let us write during winter session, but apparently, according to "The Man," you can't write "a column" if you don't have "a newspaper to print it in." That's crap!

Dwarf Tossing

Dwarf Tossing, like all of the sports/competitions we've covered, is an actual affair. Remember: we are here to inform and bring you honest, tactful opinions. All of the factual information for this section came from formen.ign.com.

It's not mean, it's not cruel – so they say. Every dwarf that is involved performs voluntarily and is fairly compensated for the effort. Some dwarfs who go on tour earn six-figure incomes.

Dwarf tossing is when you toss a dwarf as far as you can.



There is no substitute for just plain putting the ball in the hoop, and there isn't much of a secret to that.

"I've never heard of a more ridiculous thing in my life," Peter Shulman, former member of the Bryant College Bowling Team, said. "I think it's unfair to the little people. People like Hank the Angry Dwarf (as featured on Howard Stern) only get angry because of ridiculous things like this."

When asked if Dwarf Bowling was even a possibility, Shulman said: "It's as if you were saying, 'let's roll them into a ball, stick them in a bag and go to the alleys to try to get a 300. The only problem is that, they unfold and don't come back in the ball return."

The longest dwarf toss was made by an English truck driver named Jimmy Leonard. He tossed the 4-foot-4, 98 pound Lenny "the Giant" 11 feet, 5 inches. It is rumored that there is an Australian record of 30 feet, but that of course, is not documented.

Dwarf tossing is illegal in many states including Florida. Hmm. It's all beginning to make sense.

Horseshoe Pitching

The National Horseshoe Pitchers Association has released their Shoe and Product catalogue, and featured is Massachusetts's pitcher and shoe supplier Edward Domey.

"These shoes are professional. Each one is professionally designed and balanced," Domey said of his product. "They may look like real horseshoes because of the shape, but they are professional."

Domey has been pitching for a long time, and younger competitors have eclipsed him.

"Let me tell you, I've been pitching for 55 years, and as I got old I got passed by," Edward said.

Make no mistake; this isn't your backyard barbeque horseshoe game.

"Everything is scored. There are different types of formats, a lot like golf. World tournaments are 40 points, others are 35 and then there's count all."

Domey expects the new catalog to help business, especially as the holidays draw nigh.

"A lot of women buy gifts for their husbands, boyfriends, girlfriends, whatever, and they can't do that without a catalogue."

This is true.

Holiday Wishes

Have a nice, safe holiday. Shoot something tasty.

Horoscopes

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You mustn't let career concerns keep you awake at night. You can be confident that you've done all you can with the resources available.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Don't just go through the motions today. Dedicate your thoughts and your energy to accomplishing something or reaching a personal goal.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – "Normal" is not something to be taken for granted today. Interpretation is the key, and you must strive to be more tolerant.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – The truth is that you're not to be satisfied by limiting yourself to one or two choices. If it's available to you, then you want it all.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You can learn a great deal today by watching and expert at work. Ask questions and the answers you get will be more than informative.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You're not likely to see your opponents making a great many mistakes today, so you had better be sure that you're prepared and on top of your game.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – A quick, clever and creative approach is sure to work best for you today – though you may want to fall back on technique when you become fatigued.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Be sure that you're giving yourself over fully to the experiences available to you today, or your enjoyment and profit will be limited.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Give your word today only when you know you can keep it. Now is no time to risk your credibility or your reputation.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Stop commenting on your own work today. Let others judge – and you concentrate on giving it the best you've got!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – This is a good day to begin controlling your emotions – particularly your anger or resentment. Negative feelings yield negative developments.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You may be asked to explain your self in some way today, but there is nothing for you to feel defensive about for any reason. Be open and honest.

March on Washington

The "Power and Class of New England," the UMass band, was invited to march in President-elect George W. Bush's inaugural parade on Jan. 20.

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

On Jan. 20 the University of Massachusetts Marching Band received one of the highest honors in its prestigious history by being invited to march in President-elect George W. Bush's inaugural parade.

It was Dec. 23, Christmas Eve, and Band Director George Parks was sitting in a Chicago concert hall for two hours when much to his surprise, he learned that "The Power and Class of New England" had been invited to march in the inauguration parade.

"We've applied every year since 1980 and this is the first time since 1980 that we've been invited to march," said Parks.

In addition to marching in the 1981 parade for then President-elect Reagan, the band also performed in the inaugural ceremonies of 1985. This year, the Massachusetts Marching band will join 37 other bands from all over the country and bands representing each branch of the armed services for the 1.65-mile parade up Pennsylvania Avenue.

Parks, whose 24 years as the band's director have been well-decorated, explained that his visits to the inaugural ceremonies are among the group's best highlights.

"They're very excited to be here and as it goes on, they get more excited. This is a big event," said Parks. "Many of them won't understand until they see it tomorrow. And many won't understand until they look back on it five years from now."

"This is absolutely one of the highest honors that an organization can have. There's great satisfaction in knowing that we're finally in one of the best groups in the United States."

The Minutemen Marching band includes 300 students from over 90 Massachusetts cities and towns and 16 other states. The Power and Class is perennially recognized as one of the top bands in the country and in 1998, won the Louis C. Sudler Trophy, the highest honor that any university marching band can receive.

Prior to the parade, the band seemed quiet and confident, ready to show President Bush its extraordinary talent.

"We're very excited," said Yarima Santiago, a senior flute player. "We're not very nervous. We know what we have to do."

As the band's uniform manager, Santiago has faced a particularly unique problem in preparing for the parade. Santiago found out about the inaugural performance on the last day of finals, right before she left for home. Since the band did not reconvene in Amherst until Wednesday Jan. 17, there has been very little time for the band to prepare for the big event. Santiago and others have had to rush to get ready, but feel that the effort will be well worth the payoff on Inauguration Day.

"This ranks right up there with going to Tennessee and winning the Sudler Trophy," said Santiago. "This is my last performance with the marching band and it's going to be great."

Evan Doyle, a sophomore saxophone player, agreed that this would be one of his more memorable moments here at UMass.

"This is a pretty impressive thing to do. Bands don't get selected unless they're of a high caliber," said Doyle. "I this will be pretty much one of the most memorable experiences of my life. It will be something I will tell my children and grandchildren."

The band was slated to march in the first division of the parade, which includes sixteen groups, according to Parks.

"I think we're supposed to be about eleventh," he said.

The band's invite to the inaugural parade is a continuation of the University of Massachusetts' recent involvement in national politics. On Oct. 3, the University of Boston hosted the first of three Presidential debates between Governor Bush and Vice President Al Gore.

"The University of Massachusetts played an important role in the presidential election as host of the first of three debates between the candidates," Governor Paul Cellucci said in a statement. "We are proud that the UMass Minutemen Marching Band will represent the University and the Commonwealth in the presidential inauguration parade."

"Our University takes enormous pride in being invited to participate in President-elect Bush's Inaugural," UMass President William Bulger said. "Every four years, we inaugurate a president, and we also pay tribute to our great democracy. It is a distinct honor to take part in this momentous national celebration. For the rest of their lives, these students will remember the day when they were able to represent their University and the Commonwealth."

The parade kicked off at approximately 2 p.m. after Bush was sworn in as the new President and delivered his inauguration address.

The Massachusetts Marching Band has also recently been invited to perform at the 2001 Bands of America Grand National Championship in Indianapolis next November, the largest national competition for marching bands.

1995 slur costly for University

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination ordered the University of Massachusetts to pay $2,500 in "emotional damages" and institute racial sensitivity training for dining common workers in a Dec. 12 ruling.

The ruling was handed down in response to a 1995 incident in which cafeteria worker, Emily Tozloski, uttered a racial slur in front of a black student, Ronald Dottin. Dottin, who at the time was a sophomore Economics major, walked into the Franklin DC on Wednesday Feb. 8. While selecting his food, Dottin recited the nursery rhyme, "eeny, meeny, miny, moe." Tozloski completed it saying, "catch a nigger by the toe."

"I was immediately shocked into a state of disbelief," Dottin told the Collegian at the time of the incident.

The incident sparked campus wide controversy, including days of sit-ins at Franklin and apologies from top University administrators, including Chancellor David K. Scott. Dottin consulted the Black Student Union and Phi Beta Sigma, a predominantly African-American fraternity, following the incident and a formal demonstration was mobilized.

On Friday, Feb. 10, Franklin was completely shut down due to the sit-in. In the following days, pamphlets were distributed in the area describing the incident and calling for Tozloski's dismissal.

"This is not a sit-in. This is a stand-in," Taft Bailey, a then senior Legal Studies major told the Collegian in '95. "This is Black students standing up for their Civil Rights."

Immediately after the incident occurred, Dottin requested and received forms from Franklin to file an official complaint. He also wrote a letter addressed to Scott and sent it to the Amherst Chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) as well as MCAD, which handed down the case's ruling six years later. In the letter, Dottin requested Tozloski's termination.

"I'm not doing this to be some power-hungry monster," Dottin said. "When people walk into the DC, they should be served food not bigotry."

Formal apologies to Dottin were forthcoming from Scott, Director of Food Services Richard Rossi and Tozloski, herself.

"I didn't think anything about it until I saw the look on his face. I will admit to it. I just can't believe I said it," Tozloski said at the time. "I couldn't apologize more now."

However, Dottin responded to Tozloski' apology with reserve and skepticism.

"Her apology was saturated with derogatory remarks and racial undertones," he said. Dottin reiterated these same sentiments to the Hampshire Gazette after the ruling. "I don't think that to this day that her superiors really thought there was anything wrong with that apology," he said.

Tozloski, 78, of Sunderland, was suspended 10 days without pay and later relocated to a new dining commons for her actions, but never fired. She retired from the University four years ago, and was not charged in the case. However, she did testify at the trial. According to commission

Bush inaugurated amid protest, controversy

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Despite howls of complaint from the most protestors since the Nixon presidency, George W. Bush was inaugurated as the 43rd President of the United States on Jan. 20.

After a viciously contested election in which Democratic candidate Al Gore won the popular vote by more than half a million votes but lost the all important Electoral College vote by four votes, Bush called for unity in a speech that was considered short by most political pundits at only 12 minutes. In the rain and fog and snow of Washington on Jan. 20, Bush made moderate overtures, discussing the need to listen to the poorest of the poor, and to not avoid the weary traveler on the road to Jericho, quoting from the Bible.

Some of what Bush said was layered in a thick, but unintentional, irony. He said that there are those who "doubt the promise – even the justice – of our own country." Nearby, nine protestors were arrested, objecting to what they called a flawed election system in amongst other charges made. Widespread voter fraud has been alleged, as well as serious voter disenfranchisement in Florida, a state where Bush won only after the United States Supreme Court overruled the Florida Supreme Court, who had declared that all votes in the state must be counted. The US Supreme Court made the controversial decision to overturn the Florida ruling because they felt that there wasn't enough time left to count the votes, nor had strict, if any, standards been set about what votes were to be counted. Gore conceded the day after that decision.

However, he had fought a five week battle for the Presidency and while Bush now is the President, the Chicago Tribune and the Miami Herald are recounting votes under a Florida "Sunshine" Law, a recount which some expect to show that, had recounts continued, Gore would have won.

Bush, for his part, doesn't seem concerned with his loss in the popular vote, an election that, while described as "razor thin" by news organizations, was actually only the third closest in the last forty years in terms of the vote of the people. Both Democrats won in those tight elections, with Jimmy Carter beating Gerald Ford in 1976 and John Kennedy beating Richard Nixon in 1960 – an election decided by fewer than 100,000 popular votes. All of that said, there's little chance that the Bush-Gore contest of 2000 will ever be considered anything but the closest election in American history, if for no other reason than the outcome took five weeks to reach and came down to fewer than a 1,000 vote difference in Florida.

But while some liberals including Boston Globe columnist Ellen Goodman have suggested that Bush has no conservative mandate and should be held to that by both his own and the opposing party, Bush has acted swiftly on some somewhat conservative measures, immediately banning funding for family planning groups and abortions overseas,

SCOTT ELDREGE/COLLEGIAN

Jim Eltringham

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association is anticipating a semester with mottled desires and mysterious expectations.

"It's a new year we're looking for a fresh start, said Student Trustee Seth Avaklan. "We're really working to convince the students that we're working for that."

A desire for a fresh start is something that everyone seems to have in common, but not everyone is as optimistic about it. Jim Eltringham, Speaker of the Senate expressed skepticism.

"I think anyone you interview from SGA would say that they'd like to see this semester be better than last semester, and to cut the personal bullcrap," Eltringham said. "But realistically, talk is cheap. I'm not going to sit here and say that it's going to be any better or worse than it was [last semester]. That'd be up for the students to decide."

Last semester, the SGA was torn apart by a decision to throw out the Fall's Senate elections in November. The situation was worsened by constant in-house bickering and a very controversial assumption, by some, that Greek Senators were targeted for removal.

"Last semester was wasted because people worked hard to become senators and were tossed," Eltringham explained. "That's something you have to deal with. And we're in the process of reassembling the Senate now."

How the condition of finding a new Senate will be dealt with is still up in the air. Eltringham eluded to an appeal that he and the removed Senators had filed with the Student Judiciary before last semester ended.

"I don't think they [the Student Judiciary] have had a chance to meet and consider it yet," he said.

When asked about the filed appeal, Avakian said, "I have nothing to say about that at all." He explained that there would absolutely be a new election and that it is already in the planning stages.

In the event of a new election, Avakian said that he is looking for most of the people who ran last time to run again and win.

"We'll be identifying the locations where there wasn't a strong showing in terms of people running for seats and trying to find people in those areas to run for seats," he said. "We know where we're good and we know where we're not so good. I'm looking to find some issues to draw some commuter students because that's been a big issues in the past."

Avakian also claimed that there will be, one or two "hot" referendum questions on the Senate election ballots. He would not elaborate on what those questions would be about, but claimed that their subject matter may get the University national attention.

If the elections do take place, Greek involvement will potentially be the most discussed topic.

Eltringham, who brings an assumption of a mixed Greek image on campus, said, "It's unfortunate, but I think there are going to be people who were in the Senate who are not going to come back because they've been turned off and heard a loud and clear, 'we don't want you here.' On the other hand, I think there are going to be quite a few people, who are going to say, 'I want to see an SGA that's more representative of the students, and therefore, I want to get involved.'"

About possible Greek involvement, Avakian said, "I would imagine after last semester that they'll be heavily involved this semester. I've always said it, and I'll say it again; I encourage as many students as possible to get involved. I encourage participation from everyone."

Eltringham seemed positive about the possibility of some Greek students returning to the senate.

"Realistically, whenever we have controversies like this, there are always people who come out and say 'I'm sick of hearing about controversies, I want to hear about positives,' and they get involved," he explained.

As for specific goals and expectations of whatever Senate is in place for the Spring 2001 semester, Avakian said that they will be really busy, and specifically the Senate Ways and Means Committee will have a lot to do.

"Hopefully Mike Taugher [chair of the Ways and Means Committee last semester] will chair it again," he said.

Avakian also noted that the Senate will have an abundant amount of policy initiatives to take care of.

"There wasn't a lot done by the Senate in terms of policy initiatives last semester, and there's a lot of issues affecting students right now," he said. "So hopefully it'll be the most powerful senate this campus has ever seen."

Eltringham's expectations of the Senate were much more vague citing, "not getting thrown out," being his biggest hope.

"The hope of the SGA has always been the Senate," Eltringham proclaimed. "It's where we get our leaders of tomorrow and where we get the people who most accurately identify with their constituents because they're elected by a building, cluster or living area rather than the whole campus. Those of us who are in the SGA leadership really it's nice to be there to steer the ship, but at the same time we're not the ones manning the oars."

Michael McCarthy, Associate Speaker of the Senate commented on the SGA's ability to form a new Senate.

"If everyone can put aside their differences, we can get a lot accomplished," he said.

Besides the Senate elections, the next biggest step for the SGA this semester will be the annual elections for SGA President and Student Trustee in March. Unlike the Senate Elections, there is no uncertainty about whether or not they will actually take place.

A big concern about the March elections is that voter turnout will severely decrease and students will become uninterested after the Senate elections.

"It certainly is an unfair burden on the elections commission because they'll have to run three elections," Eltringham said. "They'll now have to run two Senates, and the President and Trustee elections. For them, it's going to be pretty heated. There

A new UMass

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

Coming soon to the South Shore: a University of Massachusetts education.

The University of Massachusetts-Boston has confirmed that it will begin offering classes in Plymouth starting in September. Far more tentative plans are also in the works for offering UMass-Boston classes in the city of Brockton.

"This is not a sixth campus, this is not a branch campus, but rather a remote site location [of UMass Boston] serving greater Plymouth," said Dirk Messelaar, the Dean of Continuing Education for the school.

Even though neither town will become a separate campus in the UMass system, it is hoped that at least the Plymouth location will develop to the point where a full bachelor's degree and perhaps even beyond are offered. The Plymouth program will begin with small classes geared mainly towards business.

Some have suggested that these new institutions will help to provide a more advanced education to students who do not wish or cannot afford to leave the area. The South Shore features many two-year schools such as Cape Cod Community College in West Barnstable, Massasoit Community College in Brockton, and Quincy College at Plymouth (fondly referred to by the locals as the University of North Street), but there are no schools on the South Shore offering advanced degrees.

As part of the University and President Bulger's commitment to Distance Learning, some classes in Plymouth my be linked by the internet to classes in Boston, as the students view lectures and demonstrations online. The "virtual classroom" lurches ever closer.

In addition to assisting with education, it is thought that the new school programs will help boost the local economy. Plymouth has been trying to lure higher education to town for years, initially on the site of the now-closed Plymouth County Jail. The exact site of the new UMass satellite has yet to be announced, although the Cordage Park building, a landmark former rope factory and outlet mall now nearly empty, has been mentioned as a possible location. The new institutions may also include some of the local attractions, such as the Plymouth Plantation and the waterfront, to supplement their academic classes. "We'd work with the HRTA [hotel, restaurant, and travel administration] program. We are very interested in the tourist industry on Cape Cod," Messelaar said.

The South Shore, the area extending from the southern suburbs of Boston to Cape Cod, has been the largest-growing area of Massachusetts since the Seventies, picking up much steam since the early Nineties. Despite a recent hit to the local economy caused by the collapse of cranberry prices, the area's population and economy has grown immensely over the past decade. The population of Plymouth alone has reached 50,000 people.

"[The South Shore is the] largest growing area of Massachusetts, with lots of high tech workers looking for training, and they are not serviced by any other campus," Messelaar said.

Daily Collegian - striving to serve you better

ADAM MARTIGNETTI

The Daily Collegian is, and always has been, a paper by the students and for the students. The Collegian exists to serve the student body.

We seek to serve in several ways. We try to provide factual news and sports stories on the scholastic, local, national, and international levels to increase the knowledge and awareness of the student body. We endeavor to give unbiased, fair reviews of the arts, so that the students of UMass have a better understanding of who and what best deserves their money and their time. We look to provide opinion pieces by students, both to inform and to entertain.

We also try to serve you in ways largely defined in the negative – in what we don't do. We do not mindlessly serve up propaganda for anyone, be they the administration, an athletic team, or a student group. Since the Collegian is totally financially independent from the University, we have no obligation to protect the administration or to do anything in regard to our coverage that would mislead our readers as to the true nature of events. We report on sports with the greatest possible objectivity, neither glossing over ugly defeats nor overprafsing easy wins. We seek to not be biased in our news stories. We work tirelessly to not allow stories of importance to the students of UMass slip through our finger or fall through the cracks.

In order to further these goals and ideals, we at the Collegian have implemented many changes that will affect both the form and the content of what will reach you, the reader.

The special-interest pages of the Collegian (what we referred to as the 'Diversity Pages') will no longer be appearing in the paper. We came to the realization that, while the Diversity Pages did ensure regular coverage for groups such as African-Americans and the GLBT community, it was totally unfair of us to assume that events only happened to these communities once every other week or only to members of those specific groups.

In place of these pages, we have made a pledge and directed our efforts towards stepping up our coverage of the groups previously covered in the Diversity Pages – but now in the News section, in a timely manner, and on the front page, where stories of this sort belong. We have created a new position, Diversity Editor Tanya Mannes, entrusted to act as a liason between the Collegian and groups on campus to facilitate coverage and keep up with events.

Through changes like this and our commitment to consistently providing the highest-possible quality newspaper which the combined skills of the entire Collegian staff can produce, we hope to provide you, the students of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, with the best college newspaper in the country. We set our goals no lower than that.

As you read this issue and all the other issues which follow it, remember that what you have in front of you is not simple newsprint, but the combined efforts of dedicated students such as yourself attempting tirelessly to reach the goals set forth above, while constantly evolving to improve in any way we see possible.

This is the purpose of the Daily Collegian.

Shootings hit close to home

It's December 26th, the day after Christmas.

I've just come home from shopping for a late Christmas present – another pair of Sketchers rip-off sneakers since I destroyed my last pair during the better part of the Fall semester.

I settle down on my living room couch with a turkey sandwich to enjoy the pleasures of my new Seven double DVD (thanks to my sister for a great Christmas gift).

I turn on my TV to see the words "7 killed in Wakefield office shooting" splashed across the local news broadcast. I do a double take. I rub my eyes to make sure that they are not deceiving me. I turn the channel from seven to four to five and back again. Then, the painful reality sets in. It's real. They're not kidding. Seven people have just been shot and killed in my hometown, where I've lived my entire life.

The news teams do their usual bit. I've seen segments like this a thousand times. I'm sure everyone has. They start asking people who were in the building at the time the seemingly obvious question, "Did you feel like you were in any danger at the time?" It's an absurd question at any time, but now it feels particularly dumb. This time, it is all different somehow. This time, I recognize the backdrops for the interviews. I recognize where these people are, even if I do not know them.

The TV cuts to some aerial footage of the area and I realize that I know where these people were shot even better than I had originally thought. It's the office building across from St. Joseph's Parish.

St. Joseph's Parish. I was baptized there. I received my First Communion there. I was confirmed there. For the greater part of 16 years, I spent one hour there every Sunday. Only two days earlier, less than 48 hours earlier, on Christmas Eve, I went to Mass there.

I parked in that garage! That same garage where police officers now held 42-year-old Michael McDermott's car in custody. I might have even parked in the same spot. 42-year-old Michael McDermott, who had just shown up for work the day after Christmas and killed seven people.

Back to the aerial footage. There's St. Joseph's school only minutes down the street. For 11 years, I attended school there – complete with nuns, the Our Father and turn the other cheek.

There's the 7-11. We used to walk there after school to get Slurpees and candy bars and those cream-filled Hostess cakes.

In this approximately half-mile stretch, I spent most of my pre-teenage life – some people may say my formative years.

It gets worse.

The Assistant District Attorney comes on and starts saying things like "AK-47, shotgun and semi-automatic handgun." This isn't exactly light artillery. This isn't stuff that you pick up at the local fish-and-tackle store. In fact, this is the stuff pre-adolescent boys only dream about picking up in a game of Doom or Quake.

This isn't a video game though. This is quite real.

Forty-two-year-old Michael McDermott took an AK-47, a shotgun and a semi-automatic handgun into work the day after Christmas and killed seven people in the quiet town of Wakefield, MA, where I've lived my entire life.

I know what you're thinking. The Columbine shootings and the Littleton shootings and others like it should have made people aware of danger everywhere, even in suburban, middle class, predominantly white towns (say 15 miles north of Boston). You're thinking that people have ignored inner city shootings for far too long, with no media attention, never mind the outcry that followed Columbine. (As I write this, the Wakefield shootings are the top story on MSN, CNN and Yahoo. A town of 25,000 people in northeast Massachusetts is the number one story on the most-visited news websites nationwide.) You're thinking that I have lived a sheltered life. You say that I'm young, inexperienced, naive and, in some ways, just plain ignorant.

Know what? I'm not going to argue with you. I'm not going to disagree with you.

It's true. I've never seen anyone get shot, as I'm sure some people who are reading this probably have. I've never known anyone who has been murdered. I did not know anyone in that office building. I've never held a dying friend in my arms and watched him breathe his final breath looking to me for help. I've never done any of that.

Still, shouldn't human mortality should be a given by this point? Isn't death just another part of life? Talking as a person who indulges in a significant amount of popular culture – TV, movies and music alike, I should not be surprised by the human capacity for violence and death. Right? After all, I'm supposed to be desensitized to all of this. I'm not supposed to be affected.

I was affected though. I am affected. I don't pretend to live in a perfect world and I don't for a second believe that my town is the perfect place to live. This isn't Pleasantville. This isn't Seahaven from The Truman Show. In fact, this isn't a movie at all. This is quite real (not that those other shootings weren't and the ones that happen everyday aren't, but this is real for me, and that's scary).

It's not just scary in the obvious sense that something like this could happen to any of us at any moment without warning. No, that's not scary because I guess, in a way, I have already realized that.

For me, it's scary that as I sit here writing this, seven families are grieving because their son or daughter or father or uncle or cousin was shot on the day after Christmas. It's scary that as I sit here with my new CD burner installed, my new DVD sitting in front of me, wearing my new Sketchers rip-off sneakers, looking at my family's half-decorated Christmas tree, seven people were killed not more than three minutes from my house.

It's scary because it made me take a step back and appreciate what I have this holiday season. It put things in perspective for me in an ultra-realistic and tragic way.

My heart goes out to the families of the seven victims. During a time that is supposed to be filled with joy and happiness, they now have only loss and sorrow. I can only hope that they will some day be able to cope with the pain and tragedy of this day. I know that I, myself, will keep it in mind for a long time to come.

Acid, Eastcide, hardcore, and a final goodnight

ROB SCHULZE

Strength is a funny thing.

I went to a show at the Elk's Lodge in my hometown over break. It was a typical small-town rock show – one semi-known name, a couple of established local bands, and two hardcore bands made up of high school kids. I love going to shows like this, even if I am usually one of the oldest people there. To me, this is rock in its purest form. It is young, uncorrupted, and filled with unfeigned energy. Just kids doing it for the love.

Unfortunately, I was not fated to have a flawless Plymouth experience that night.

My ex-girlfriend was there.

This, in and of itself, was not a problem. It had been four months since we'd broken up. Well, OK, let's be honest here – she dumped me. I find it interesting how it's always 'I broke up with her' when you do the dumping, but when you are the dumped, it becomes 'We broke up.'

Anyways, it wasn't a big deal that she was there. We'd gone out, hung out a couple of times since the break-up, and, as far as I was concerned, things were cool. She had a new boyfriend. I had an interest, and we were well on our merry way to becoming that most rare and elusive of couples – the former-daters who can still enjoy each other's company. I thought this was a good thing.

She and her boyfriend got out of the car directly in front of where me and my friend were standing waiting for the doors to open. I'd say they were probably three feet away. She totally ignored me. Didn't even say hello. She turned her back to me without a glance and leaned into her boyfriend.

Ouch.

After about 30 seconds, I figured I had to do something besides stand there. The situation was (for me, at least) beyond awkward and I wanted to do something to defuse it.

I walked over to them. I said "I came to say hello because I'll feel bad if I don't." She curtly asked "Why?" I gave the boyfriend a big hug. He and I had been acquainted before – I wanted to 1) show that I was an adult and cool with the situation and 2) inject some humor to defuse the tension. He looked absolutely terrified. Then they just looked at me. I went away.

I was hurt. I was hurt bad, actually. How could she not even say hello to me? I couldn't help but think that after all I did for her, all I went through, all the love I gave, after it all she owed me, if nothing else, a hello.

Most of this is my fault. To a large extent, I lack the ability to control my emotions; in fact, the reverse is largely true. My emotions control me. I cannot consciously change them, no matter how much I'd like to. I loved her, and I couldn't change that to hate, or even a cool, subdued dislike, no matter how much easier it would have made my life. I'm a sap, basically. A sucker. Weak.

The Elk's in Plymouth is small. The room where the show was held is about the size of maybe a Hertter classroom and a half. It was half to three-quarters full the entire time. We avoided each other like the plague. In a small room of 16-year-olds we might as well have been in different hemispheres. It sucked.

I'll skip the narration and cut to the chase. I found out from a mutual friend in attendance that she was tripping on acid. There was a chance she'd dropped some E too, but that wasn't clear. I had wondered why she was spending a lot of time sitting on the floor. She wasn't able to stand up.

If you aren't me then you probably won't understand the reaction this caused in me. Her drug use had always terrified me. I had cried for the very first time in almost 10 years when she'd gone on E and hurt herself badly while we were dating. She was slamming her hands in cabinet doors because she couldn't feel them. Her head had been next.

This was the icing on the cake. The person who, at this point (sweet God, hopefully not forever) had been the strongest love of my life, won't say hello to me or even talk to me, even though she'd done both earlier in the week, was high as the sky, and probably didn't even recognize me due to the chemicals in her bloodstream.

I laid down on the floor.

I was choked with my own emotions. I hated her for having the power to do this to me without even thinking about it. I hated myself for being this weak. I hated drugs. I hated the little kids in Misfits shirts who kept stepping on me.

Mostly, I thought about what I'd do about it. I knew I'd never sleep if I didn't work out the emotions somehow, if I couldn't find a way to free my mind. Would I steal some of my dad's beers and pass out? He'd never miss them. Lord knows he's got enough. Would I run until I fell down in the snow and was unable to rise, and just had to lay there, sweating and steaming, until I got enough strength back to hobble back to my house and my bed? Would I use my old friend Mr. Boxcutter to bleed my problems away? These were all viable solutions. They had worked before.

And no, the thought of just not being such a pussy and getting over it never occurred to me.

Then the headlining band, Eastcide, came up. The music was good, and the music was loud. And then it happened.

It hadn't happened in years. I was beginning to think that I was too old, that I'd lost the ability to lose myself in the music. All my emotions, all my contradictions and flaws and frustrations – all of it came pouring out. It came out in my body, the violent horrible dancing I subjected myself to, it came out in the rage with which I screamed the lyrics back at the singer, and it came out in the blissful, satisfied smile which was on my face the entire time.

It led me to two epiphanies. (Not bad for a 40-minute set.)

During 'Grow High,' about dealing with a loved one with a drug problem, the lyrics suddenly snapped into my head. Something I'd known all along, but had been afraid to deal with freed itself and become clearer than the sky. She wasn't my problem any more. I'd done everything I could to help her, and more than she had any right to expect or that she even deserved. I was just clinging to a sense of something that no longer existed. She was on her own. And that was fine with me.

That was the part that I had never faced – I liked not having to deal with her shit anymore. I was happier without all the bull and all the problems. I finally thought the thought that I had needed to think for so long: "Thank God she dumped me, 'cuz I never would have left her, and it was the best thing that ever happened to me." I said it to all my friends afterwards, just because I liked the way it sounded. (For the record – it sounded damn good.) Does that make me a bad person? Probably, but I made my peace with that long ago.

The other realization came during my favorite Eastcide song, "Bucolic." As the singer shoved the mike in my face and I screamed out the chorus 'You want enemies? You made enemies!' I realized that I was singing to her, with all that implied.

I was done with her. Finally and totally. Fck that 'let's be friends' crap.

What about that 'oh, but I love her and I can't change my emotions' stuff I talked about earlier? It's true. However, emotions are complex – I didn't change my love to hate that night. I simply realized that there were other emotions there too. I managed to get in touch with my bitterness, and my resentment, and my innate sense of superiority to a drop-out who still lives with her mom, drops tabs, and screwed me over bad. I'll always love her, in a way. I just won't ever let it bother me again.

As I walked out, I realized that I didn't have a care in the world. I walked over to her little circle of friends, put my arms around everyone's shoulders, leaned in, and said 'Goodnight, everyone!' in the most cheerful voice of my entire life. Then I walked away, the smile still gleaming off my sweaty face.

I didn't look back.

Turns out that I'm stronger than I thought I was.

Eminem's "Stan" rewritten – Dubya has a fan

RYAN BENHARRIS

"My tea's gone cold, I'm wondering why I got out of bed at all. The morning rain clouds up my window, and I can't see at all. Be right if I could it'll all be great. Put your picture on my wall. It reminds me that it's not so bad. It's not so bad..."

Dear George,

I wrote you but you still ain't calling. I left my cell, my pager, and instructions on how to use the phone at the bottom. I sent two letters after inauguration. You must notta got em.' There probably was a problem at the post office or something. It must be an early indication of how literally everything's gonna go wrong now that you're in office. But anyways, fu.k it, what's been up man? How's your brother? He still think you're an idiot? Guess what, the hooker I visit every now and then is pregnant too. I'm about to be a father. If I ever have a son, guess what I'm gonna call him? I gonna name him Junior! I read about your Labor Secretary too - I'm sorry. I had a friend who got turned down for a job at McDonald's because of some slave she made clean the dog sh.t out of her backyard lawn. I know you probably hear this everyday, but I'm your biggest fan. I even got the speech where you called England's Prime Minister Tony Claire. I sold it out of my bootlegging van. I got a room full of your posters and your pictures man. I like the sh.t you did with Cheney, too, that sh.t was phat. Anyways, I hope you get this. Hit me back, we can get high together. Truly yours, your biggest fan, this is Stan.

"My tea's gone cold, I'm wondering why I got out of bed at all. The morning rain clouds up my window, and I can't see at all. Be right if I could it'll all be great. Put your picture on my wall. It reminds me that it's not so bad. It's not so bad..."

Dear George,

You still ain't called or wrote. I hope you have a chance. I ain't mad. I just think it's f.cked up you don't answer your dealer's beeps. If you didn't want to talk to me outside the debate, you didn't have to. But you could've signed an autograph for Kathy. That's my mother man, she's 85 years old, and retired in Florida. We waited in the blistering cold for you for four hours and you just said no. That's pretty sh.tty man. You're like her f.cking idol. She voted for you, man. Well, kinda. She voted for Nader. I ain't that mad though. I just don't like being lied to. Remember when we met in a sketchy alley in Denver? You said if I sold you two bags of hardcore narcotics, we'd joyride together. See, I'm just like you in a way. I never left my father neither. He runs my job for me. He mixes the cocaine with baking powder, packs it into a marble, shoves it up my ass, and I smuggle it into prisons. I can relate to what you're saying in your debate (what I can understand of it. it gets tough when you don't make much sense), so when I have a sh.tty day, I throw the tape in the VCR, drift away and put it on. Cuz I don't really got sh.t else, and that sh.t helps when I'm depressed. I even got a tattoo of an elephant across the chest. When I grow up, I want to have a job executing people and see how much they scream. It's like adrenaline. their pain is such a sudden rush for me. See, everything you say is real, and I respect you cuz you do it. My mother's jealous cuz I talk about you 24-7. But she don't know you like I know you, G. No one does. You gotta call me man. You'll be the biggest client I'll ever lose. sincerely yours Stan...P.S. Al should be president too!

"My tea's gone cold, I'm wondering why I got out of bed at all. The morning rain clouds up my window, and I can't see at all. Be right if I could it'll all be great. Put your picture on my wall. It reminds me that it's not so bad. It's not so bad..."

Dear Mr. I'm too good to call or write my fellow Americans:

This'll be the last package of crack I ever send your ass. It's been six months and still no word. I don't deserve it. I assume you got my last two letters. The guy who shot up the post office said I wrote the addresses on em' perfect. So this is my cassette I'm sending you. I hope you hear it. I'm in a yacht right now. I'm doing 90 near Kennebunkport. Hey George, I snorted a fifth of a bag of cocaine. Dare me to sail? You know that song by the Presidents of the United States of America about that guy who ate all the peaches, and could've shared em', but didn't, then they said something about a lump in his head? Well that's kinda how this is. I umpy. You could've given me peaches but it's too late. I'm on three shots of heroin now and I'm drowsy. And all I wanted was a lousy letter or a call. I hope you know I replaced all your pictures on the wall. I love you George. we could've smoked crack together. Think about it. You ruined it now. I hope you can't sleep and you cry about it. And when you dream about puppies or winning the Super Bowl or whatever your peabrain fantasizes about I hope you scream about it. I hope your conscience eats at you and you can't breathe with out me. And this time it won't be from self-induced asphyxiation to get wrecked like you wanted to do in high school. See George - shut up bitch, I'm trying to talk - hey George. that's my mother screaming in the boat, but I didn't give her a lethal injection I just tied her up. See I ain't like you. Cuz if she gets her feet wet in the ocean, she'll fry better, and then she'll die too. Well, gotta go, I'm almost at a bridge now. Oh, sh.t I forgot, how am I supposed to send this sh.t out?

"My tea's gone cold, I'm wondering why I got out of bed at all. The morning rain clouds up my window, and I can't see at all. Be right if I could it'll all be great. Put your picture on my wall. It reminds me that it's not so bad. It's not so bad..." Splash!

Dear Stan,

I meant to write you sooner, but I couldn't find a crayon. Look, I'm really flattered that you would call your son that. And here's an autograph for your mother. I wrote it on an impregnated chad. Sorry I didn't see you at the debate. I was all high and sh.t. Don't think I did that sh.t intentionally just to diss you. And what's this sh.t you said about you want to have a job executing people too. I do that sh.t for fun, dog. c'mon how f.cked up is you? You got some issues. Stan, I think you need to calm down. Try not using cocaine as much, and stepping over to a lighter drug like Vicodin or Percocet. And what's this sh.t about Gore being the president? That psycho sh.t made him win the popular vote. I really think you and your family need each other. A family that sticks together creates a scary, Czar-like dynasty together. I hope you get to read this letter. I just hope it reaches you in time before you hurt yourself, or even worse, enter rehab. I think that you'll be doing just fine if you relax a little. I'm glad I inspire you, but Stan, answer me one question. Do you even know how many states we have in this country? No, seriously, I need to know. There's a take-home test sitting in front of me, and I need to pass it this time or else they won't let me have my finger on "the button." You know I just want you to keep doing crazy sh.t. I saw this one sh.t on the news a couple of weeks ago that made me sick. Some dude was all-high and ran for president. When he woke up from his seven-month coke-binge and search for the world's largest bong hit, he lived in the White House. I can't even remember his name, but his mother Barbara wrote it on my underwear. Come to think about it, his name was... it's me...damn!

The real Slim Shady?

Saving papers

MATTHEW DESPRES

Some 30 days ago, the world held its collective breath and crossed the threshold into the year 2001.

Welcome to the new millennium (again).

It is the year that Stanley Kubrick foresaw, albeit incorrectly, in his 1968 film 2001: A Space Odyssey, a film that captured the imagination of a society on the verge of setting foot on the moon. In the 33 years since that film, our society has made tremendous advances, but none so far-reaching as what Kubrick envisioned. We have yet to colonize space (a feat that continues to look more difficult each day), and our interest in doing so, in the general public at least, has seemingly waned. Despite these shortcomings, we remain a society that leans heavily on a technological crutch. The Internet has become our favorite method of accomplishing everything from shopping to communicating with friends across the world. Although the web maintains an uncertain climate, and dot-coms plunge into some kind of HmELL everyday, we continue to digitize, hoping that in the end, the success will outweigh the failures.

The successes, when they do come, have often times proved to be of immeasurable value to our way of life. The technology of the Internet crosses boundaries, enabling those with the means to be online the potential for better lives. It has found ways to work around disabilities and age, and makes no judgement on the basis of color or sex.

Within the benefits, however, lie the problems that exist within any new project or frontier. There are almost certainly a great number of people not benefiting from our advances, and that has the potential to create a gap in this world the size of which has never been seen. With that gap crumbles some percentage of the population's ability to stay current and abreast of what goes on in their world, partly because the media, an entity designed to serve the people, has been swept up in this enormous wave and taken for a ride. Suddenly, all of our eggs have been placed in one basket.

So what does this mean?

It means that the newspaper, the foundation of news and journalism, has been largely sacrificed, passed over in favor of the internet and other technologies that can deliver the news hundreds of times faster than traditional print media, and even television, the last great pioneer in the information age.

Faster, however, does not always mean better. As someone who leans heavily towards the print media for information, I think there is still a great amount of wealth and promise for the newspaper in the year 2001. Edward R. Murrow, one of the great pioneers for CBS in the early days of television broadcasting, once had this to say about television as a news source. "This instrument can teach, it can illuminate, yes, it can even inspire. But it can do so only to the extent that humans are determined to use it to those ends." The sentiment, I truly believe, could easily be applied to newspapers as well. They remain the workhorses of the news world, able to offer depth where TV soundbites come up short and the experience and reputation that the online news media has yet to gain. It's up to us to rediscover the standards on which this industry was founded.

The biggest obstacle facing that potential return to past glory, though, is that the newspaper cannot meet the one task this world has come to demand: information on a moment's notice. The pace of our lives has increased along with the technology, leaving the average person little time to sit down and leaf through a paper that may, in fact, be old news by the time lunch rolls around. It is a legitimate point, and certainly a tough one to argue. How does a newspaper overcome the perks of the Internet that have become so desirable and commonplace in our everyday lives?

A present strength that could be utilized more often is the ability of any given paper to tap into their pool of readership and make more direct connections with their readers. Papers can and should practice public journalism more often by asking their audience on the issues that affect them the most. Rather than relying on informal polls to get a feel for the audience, a practice most websites employ, newspapers can send reporters out to ask questions and put faces to the subjects they cover. Writers can immerse themselves in the ideas that often bring them close to deadline, and offer an insight in their writing that more distant mediums can only hope to replicate. It's old fashioned, but news begins with the people, and newspapers are in a position to enhance that relationship more than any other medium.

If nothing else, the election debacle of last year proved to us all that the media is quite capable of creating it's own news in an attempt to reach our homes so quickly. In the space of one evening, for those watching any one of the major network broadcasts, the presidency had changed hands no less than three times. Were the newspapers without fault the next morning? Certainly not. However, they did have the gift of time, however slight it was, and most exercised it smartly. More intelligently than the networks and their respective websites at least.

The newspapers also, for the most part, manage to sidestep the bloating that has plagued the television industry. Rather than being inundated with live video of something meaningless (that U-Haul carrying the ballots is a perfect example) for hours at a time, we have the option to pick up a newspaper and seek out what we want, when we want it. This is a clear advantage over any other medium.

So what does this mean to you? I happen to care because I've embraced this thing called journalism and have decided to make a career of it. Chances are you haven't. But you have picked up this paper and, for better or worse, read the articles inside because you cared. It's an equal forum in which we can express our opinions and, hopefully, you'll respond with yours. It's something that you can get your hands on and carry around. Every person is entitled to an accurate account of the day's news, and in this age of rapidly advancing technology, the print media leads the pack when placed in the right hands. The newspaper is not only something that can illuminate, it's something that should illuminate, and for some time to come.

America: where losers win

SAM WILKINSON

If you're reading this, the hounds I heard scraping at the gate 10 days ago haven't been broken through. Our nation still survives, despite desperate attempts otherwise.

We're now one-tenth of the way towards a completed first 100 days, which means only another 1451 days to go until we have a different president, thank the good lord looking over us all. George W. Bush, despite his inane supporter's claims that he'll do something, anything, of value for this country, has already managed to oversee a steep decline in our economy, an inauguration with more protestors than any since Vietnam was more than a struggling Asian nation and the nomination of a labor secretary who didn't employ legal employees.

It isn't going to be fun for most of us, unless you go to Amherst College – then your dad's sure to get a 40 percent tax cut making sure that you can keep more of your money because gosh durnit, we're to be trusted with our money, perhaps one of the most ridiculous political assertions of the past few years. But I don't expect better from Republicans convinced that labor unions are bad for our nation and that Iraq is still of any concern to us as a people. Perhaps the only real lesson we can take from all of this (other than the clever new title for Bush's music: Hail to the Thief) is the ability of losers to end up winning.

How?

Look at John Ashcroft, a candidate for Senate who couldn't beat his deceased opposition, yet still gets a nomination for Attorney General. Unbelievable. While losing to animated zombies happens on a regular basis in South Carolina when Strom Thurmond wins, losing to the literal, out-and-out dead is a quite different story.

Ashcroft better have more than a little life in him if he wants to keep up his winning ways; 200 different groups opposing him doesn't bode particularly well for the man from Missouri.

Dan Coats from Indiana was considered for a job, as was Slade Gorton of Washington and now Jim Talent from Missouri. All lost their campaigns. Spencer Abraham got a nomination after losing in Michigan and opposing the existence of the office he has been nominated for, Secretary of Energy.

The infamously inane Chavez (who also opposed such anti-labor policies as, oh, the minimum wage) lost her only campaign in Maryland in 1986, but Bush teaches by example, and why have one example of a loser nominated when he could have three?

Other losers that might end up winning? State's rights, as Bush inexplicably came out in favor of strong state's rights, yet clearly opposed them when it came to his election. How strangely bizarre and fantastical, if weren't such a good reason of cynicism and bitterness. To use the Supreme Court to overrule a state court interpreting state law before turning around and declaring the need for strong states is ludicrous at best, horrifically ignorant of what just happened at worst.

Of course, he need look no further than the mirror for one of the bigger losers to come out of politics recently – there'll be a day soon when one of the Florida newspapers announces that a recount would have given the election to Gore, meaning that while Bush got beaten fairly soundly in the election of the people (by more than 500,000 votes) he also should have lost in the vote that really counts, the Electoral vote, which he only won by a growing-ever-shadier four votes. 450 pages of people who swear they weren't even allowed to vote isn't good news for a President that a significant portion of Americans say they don't trust. Why is that a bad thing?

Because we all knew not to trust Clinton, we got used it, we accepted it. Bush claimed we'd have every reason not to look at him in the same light as we did with Clinton and he's right – Clinton's election to office never really required the prevention of people from voting.

Nevermind personal bitterness and fear for the future, back to my list of big losers who might just end up winning. In writing this late at night I was fairly sure there'd be no bigger loser who ended up winning than Bush, but the Democrats are going to come quite close. Why? Because despite losing the Presidency in 2000, by 2001, they might have the campaign finance reform that only staunch conservatives have prevented from becoming reality, by 2002, they should have majority controls of the House and Senate, especially after they witness the damage that Republicans will cause over the next two painful years, and by 2004, they should have soundly defeated Bush in an election.

At some point, the American public will look at Bush with their usual, critical eye and see, not a man from Texas who seeks to "unify" to avoid all of the usual stuffy politics, but rather a politician with alliances like every other rat. When they do, they'll realize that they haven't picked a very good one and he'll be swept out of office.

The Republicans may have won big in 2000, but just barely, and not really at all. Bush scored the upset victory, but he'll leave his party upset at the end of his four-year reign, a fool who will go down in history as the worst Bush to run this country, a difficult task as his only competition is his inept father.

And maybe that's why the hounds didn't tear down the gates – they wanted to see that competition on ineptitude, to see if the younger could pull out the big victory. All indicators point towards a win.

documents, Tozloski claimed that she had been taught the nursery rhyme with the racial slur as a child. She also said that she was not a racist and members of her family had dated "your people." Tozloski's nephew and stepniece are both married to African Americans.

"It remains unclear whether Tozloski deliberately intended to hurt [Dottin]," said Edward Mitnick in his ruling, "or attempted to engage in what she viewed as harmless or flippant banter."

"Notwithstanding, the Commission has previously held that the 'I did it but was only joking' defense did not preclude liability for national origin harassment where the complainant or a reasonable person in his position would have perceived the jokes as an insult."

Dottin told the Gazette that the $2,500 represented, to him, partial compensation for the cost of his University meal plan for that year. He was happy with the MCAD's ruling.

"I'm very satisfied. I guess in a way it made me feel like I wasn't crazy," said Dottin. "More importantly, they're going to have mandatory sensitivity training."

Paul Page, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance, expressed disappointment at the ruling in a statement to the press, but ultimately said that the University will comply with the conditions.

"We are disappointed with the ruling of the MCAD because we believe the University presented a strong case in the matter," Page said. "The University already requires annual diversity training for managers and employees in the food services area. The program, instituted following the incident in question, is ongoing and includes individual and group sessions."

Dottin, 25, is now employed by JP Morgan as an investment banker in New York.

Tozloski refused to comment on the ruling when contacted at home by the Gazette.

The '95 Dottin incident was the second racial incident that week in which UMass was directly involved. On Feb. 7 of that year, the day before the Dottin incident, a UMass-Rutgers game had to be suspended at half-time due to a sit-down protest.

A lone female black student, who sat down at center court during halftime of the game, started the protest herself. It escalated soon thereafter as about 150 more students joined her on the court. About ten minutes later, then Atlantic 10 commissioner Linda Bruno had the game suspended and Louis Brown Arena evacuated.

The protest was in response made by Rutgers President Francis Lawerence the previous Fall. On Nov. 4, 1994, Francis made comments in a faculty meeting that minority students did not have the genetic background to do well on college entrance exams.

The protestors and many others called from Francis' dismissal. Shirley Turner, a then New Jersey assemblywoman, called the remarks "an ugly, senseless and needless incident."

However, Francis did received support from faculty, administrators and students alike and was never fired.

The UMass-Rutgers game was later played March 2 on a neutral site.

Students respond to DC racial slur lawsuit

University of Massachusetts students generally agreed with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination's order for the University to pay $2,500 and provide racial sensitivity training to cafeteria workers in regard to an incident that occurred in Feb. of 1995.

The MCAD's ruling was in response to an incident involving then sophomore Ronald Dottin and Franklin dining commons worker Emily Tozloski.

On Feb. 8, Dottin walked into the Franklin DC. While selecting his food, he recited the nursery rhyme, "eeny, meeny, miny, moe." Tozloski, 78, of Sunderland, completed the rhyme, "Catch a nigger by the toe."

Tozloski later apologized and claimed that she had been taught the nursery rhyme with the racial slur as a child. MCAD's decision was based on precedent that the "I was only joking" defense did not preclude defendants from paying damages for racially insensitive comments.

Jen Tighe, a freshman DC worker, acknowledged that some cafeteria workers can be stand-offish.

"After working four months, some still don't acknowledge you. You ask a question, they hardly answer it and leave you to search around the whole kitchen," said Tighe. "To get some of them to sign you in is nearly impossible."

Student Trustee Seth Avakian said that it was important not to focus on the past, but rather to ensure that such incidents would not happen in the future.

"Racism exists all over this world, even at this University, and it's important for members of the University community to always be reminding themselves that it's something to work on and strive towards and unfortunately sometimes it takes a court case to remind us," he said. "What happened then was in the past, and the real issue is to make sure that something like that doesn't happen in the future."

Senior Melissa Fredette admits it has been a long time since she has been in the dining commons, but praises cafeteria workers nonetheless. "They have always been nice," she said.

Bluewall cafeteria worker Dale Reynolds, who had never heard the incident concerning Dottin, believes that all food service workers should go to sensitivity and diversity training.

"Everyone should know how to deal with people," he commented. Tighe believes the program can work as long as "they [cafeteria workers] take it seriously. It seems some of them are bent in their ways."

Paul Page, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance, expressed disappointment over the MCAD's ruling, but said that the University would abide by the ruling.

"We are disappointed with the ruling of the MCAD because we believe the University presented a strong case in this matter," said Page in a statement to the press. "The University, however, will comply with the commissioner's ruling."

New crop of UM profs

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

A number of new faces will be seen on the University of Massachusetts campus this semester.

New faculty members will be joining various departments including the College of Natural Sciences, Mathematics, and the School of Education.

The School of Education added seven new faculty members to its ranks just before break. The department hired Maureen Adams as an associate professor in the area of social justice education. She received her PH.D from Indiana University. Another new hire to the department is assistant professor Alberto Arenas. He will be working in the area of international education and policy program evaluation and also specializes in ecological sustainability.

Two more new staff members for the department are Lenore Carlisle and Margaret Gebhard both hired as assistant professors. Carlisle will be working with faculty in the area of elementary education while Gebhard's interests lie in English as a second language.

Other new assistant professors include Clare Kilbane, Linwood Vereen and Ximena Zuniga. Kilbane will be focusing her energies in the area of educational technologies and lists her special skills as teacher preparation and professional development of in-service teachers. Vereen's interests on the other hand lie in the area of school counseling education and educational psychology. To round out the staff new employee Zuniga will be working with students in the area of social justice education and will bring to the staff his skills in diversity education.

In the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, six new names were added to the school's academic roster in the fall. Jeffery Podos and Yin-Long Qiu were hired as assistant professors in the biology department. Podos focuses most of his studies on the evolution of animal behavior and the vocal development of songbirds, while Qui typically studies the relationships between organismal phylogenetics and evolutionary genomics.

Todd Emerick, a new assistant professor hire in the area of polymer science and engineering typically focuses his studies on polymer synthesis.

"Much of what is commonly referred to as polymer chemistry depends critically on the various interactions of these small organic compounds," he explained about his work in a statement to the press. "However, the ultimate properties of polymers differ enormously from small molecules, which makes the field of polymer science both fascinating for fundamental study, and practical from the standpoint of commercial applications."

Additional personnel were hired for physics, astronomy and mathematics and statistics departments. Carlo Dallapiccola of the physics department studies the behavior of subatomic particles and works in the field of experimental high-energy particle physics. Min Yu of the astronomy department's main interests lie in the formation and evolution of galaxies with special attention being paid to "starbursts." Mathematics and statistics assistant professor Paola Sebastiani has a variety of interests and skills to bring to the department, which include an interest in statistics, the design of experiments and the application of statistical methods in machine learning and in artificial intelligence.

The College of Engineering also welcomed new faculty into the department with researchers joining the school in the areas of environmental, mechanical and industrial and chemical engineering. Sergio Brena an assistant professor of civil and environmental engineering, works on structural experiments with much of his research channeled into using carbon fiber reinforced polymers to strengthen bridges, research that he did while completing his doctoral work at the University of Texas at Austin. His work experience helps him in his work with the seismic rehabilitation of buildings.

David Scmidt an assistant professor of mechanical and industrial engineering focuses his work on the relationship between sprays in engines and the amount of pollution an engine produces, while John Sherman a professor of chemical engineering researches synthetic zeolites.

■ Bush

COURTESY WORLD WIDE WEB

George W. Bush is sworn is as the 43rd president on the United States. Bush pushed for states' rights and somewhat moderate issues in his inaugural address.

as well as pushing his entire $1.6 trillion dollar tax cut, a key plank in his campaign platform.

University of Massachusetts professor Vincent Moscardelli said that Bush doesn't have a mandate.

"He's acting like he has a mandate when it would really be extremely difficult to argue that he does," Moscardelli said. "A president who gets 540,000 votes less than his opponent should be held to a higher standard in terms of what he does."

Moscardelli said that while Ronald Reagan beat an incumbent soundly and was then able to push extremely conservative ideals, and while Clinton only won 43 percent of the vote in 1992, he won a sound Electoral victory, "This President didn't do those things. For him not to reach out to the broad groups he talked about [in his speech] is surprising."

The second year UMass professor contrasted Bush's immediate policy moves against his speech, which he said was "entirely consistent with the image he tried to portray during the campaign. He talked about his issues, talked about the poorest of the poor and how we as a society can't leave them behind."

And while the speech was short, Moscardelli suggested that perhaps people had gotten used to Clinton who wasn't, as the professor described, a "guy known for his self restraint." That said, he agreed with Bush left him speech open to be called fluff by critics.

"He didn't talk about specifics, and in fact seemed to avoid them," Moscardelli commented. However, some saw the speech as being a time for accessing the voters that felt disenfranchised, not establishing policy, something that both Moscardelli and George Sulzner, another UMass Political Science professor, felt the speech accomplished.

Sulzner, for his part, felt the speech was "succinct."

"It contained outreach, had Democratic themes, and really was a speech that Al Gore could have given," Sulzner said. He didn't, however, comment on any of Bush's moves soon after the inauguration though he did say that it isn't unusual for an incoming President to rescind last minute executive orders from an exiting president.

As for the speech, Sulzner suggested that Bush didn't discuss issues of mandate because, in the UMass professor's opinion, Bush didn't have one.

"He tried to reach out and talk about general things, but not specifics," Sulzner said. "As for being slightly more conservative, that's to be expected."

He said that Americans would have to wait and see if there was going to be a serious divide between what was said in his speech versus what he actually does, and that what he wanted to do would be difficult. Sulzner said that Bush's first proposals would face stiff opposition in Congress.

"He may get a tax cut, but it will be less than he wanted, but again, it's a matter that we're going to have to wait and see about," Sulzner said, also theorizing that Bush may rely on executive orders to accomplish much of what he promised during the campaign.

Some of those promises included the continued Republican theme of devolution for the Federal government, the idea of returning power to state's and, by proxy, people.

Laura Jensen, a UMass professor whose focus is states' rights, said like Sulzner, that everything was going to be wait and see, but that at least some of his proposals focus more on centralizing power than actually distributing it.

"Reviewing regulations on abortion is potentially centralizing. His proposals for the Federal role in education are centralizing, but can definitely be said about him at this point is that he's no different from any of the other presidents we've had since Nixon," Jensen commented. "There's a lot of rhetoric, but we'll have to look more closely to see an actual policy record."

Tidbits

While he might have received stiff opposition to at least two of his appointments, John Ashcroft for Attorney General and Gail Norton for Secretary of the Interior, Bush will likely see all of his cabinet picks approved by the Senate. Recent nominees Elaine Chao (who was selected after Linda Chavez withdrew her name for consideration as Secretary of Labor) and Colin Powell's son Michael for the chairmanship of the FCC, still face questioning, but easy approval is expected.

Bush's $1.3 trillion dollar tax cut is expected to end up more toward $1.6 trillion, sure to be a stumbling block for some senators and perhaps Alan Greenspan, chairman of the Federal Reserve, although some have suggested that he may back just such a cut.

There is a showdown brewing between Bush and Arizona Senator John McCain over campaign finance reform. McCain said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that he wanted immediate debate on his joint measure with Russell Feingold of Wisconsin. Senate Speaker Trent Lott, who was dealt a blow in the battle when Thad Cochrane, Mississippi's other Republican Senator, came out for campaign finance reform, wants to focus on Bush proposals first, then debate on campaign finance later. Bush seems to be ambivalent and stuck in a hard position – a majority of Americans, as well as the House of Representatives supports the bill, but signing such a law would seriously damage Republicans attempts to get elected. McCain has said if there is no debate, he will be forced to attach it as an amendment to every single piece of legislation that the Senate considers.

McCain has said that he doesn't want to be forced to do that.

are a lot of people who didn't like that Senate who was seated in the fall and if there's another Senate election, they're going to have to watch out extra carefully because you don't know what people will stop at to get those people thrown out. So, we've had instances of people bending the rules in the past, and we're kind of worried that people will see the small picture versus the big picture."

Avakian also showed concern for low voter turnout, but noted that MassPirg would be aiding in encouraging students to vote.

"They always do an excellent job at turning out more voters," he said.

Avakian also noted that he had heard ideas about possible candidates for President and Trustee, but would not comment on who they are.

Finding a new Chancellor will also be important to the SGA.

"The next Trustee would be heavily involved, and that is by far the biggest decision made at any university," said Avakian. "So I encourage students to get involved.

The 2001 Spring Concert, which is put on by the SGA and University Productions and Concerts is also a big part of the upcoming semester. Avakian said that, barring an unpredictable disaster to the Mullins Center roof, he is 99 percent sure that the event will take place.

"There are no confirmations yet, but in terms in the artist we're looking at, it's going to kick ass," he said.

Commenting on a rumor that Springfield native Staind could be a possibility for the show, Avakian said, "They're a local band, so that'd be a logical choice."

SGA President Jeff Howe was unavailable for comment at the time of this article.

The upcoming semester will be flooded with activity for the SGA. Eltringham noted, "A couple of years ago, I said, we were on the verge of a golden age of the SGA. That didn't pan out quite as much as I thought it would over the last 2 years, but now we have some fresh blood coming in, and hopefully they will break the ship."

Administration changing

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

After Chancellor David K. Scott announced that he would be resigning at the end of the upcoming semester, the University of Massachusetts administration is undergoing further changes in the New Year.

The Dartmouth campus' interim Chancellor, Dr. Jean MacCormack, became President William Bulger's selection to fill the role permanently. Bulger announced his choice on Dec. 29.

In a released statement to the press, Bulger explained his decision.

"Dr. MacCormack has been a superb leader since becoming interim chancellor 14 months ago and was strongly recommended by the search committee that reviewed the qualifications of the more than 50 candidates," the statement read. "Jean MacCormack is the right leader for the Dartmouth campus."

"I am eager to continue my work here as the permanent chancellor. The potential I see, both on the campus and in the region, excites me tremendously," MacCormack said.

"The Dartmouth campus abounds with strengths: its rich liberal arts core, its expertise in marine science and technology, its recognized commitment to student learning, and its growing and vital graduate programs and research agenda."

MacCormack's appointment will be voted on at the Feb. 7 meeting of the Board of Trustees.

The Boston campus will also be getting a new chief.

On the same day MacCormack's appointment was announced, Bulger named David MacKenzie acting Chancellor. MacKenzie was the Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance for the Boston campus.

"He has the ideal background to manage the Boston campus during this period of transition, and prepare the campus for the arrival of a new chancellor," Bulger said of MacKenzie.

The announcement came one week after the Boston Search Committee forwarded four names to the President's office. The four names were finalists for the permanent Chancellor's position.

On the Amherst campus, Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs, Cora B. Marrett, is a finalist in the search for the presidency of Iowa State University. There are three other finalists.

Marrett visited the Ames, Iowa campus on Jan. 17. She gave her thoughts on several issues, including diversity and sexual orientation.

"For me, a push for diversity is not just a question of what is this going to mean for under-represented groups," Marrett said. "It's what does it mean for broadening the opportunities, broadening the experiences of an entire institution."

"When I think about sexual orientation, that's a part of someone's life, not all of what's there. I don't define all of someone's life on the basis of their sexual orientation. The same way, I'm bothered when assumptions are made, based on someone's geographical homeland, race or ethnicity."

Marrett stressed the idea of community during the forum, which drew more than a hundred people.

"If you're talking about people being a part of community, use resources to ensure that everyone is fully a part of that community," said Marrett.

The Board of Regents for ISU is expected to make a decision about ISU's next President by Feb. 1.

The interim Vice Chancellor for Outreach, Robert Helgesen, will retire next October. Marrett appointed Helgesen last July. He had been the Dean of the College of Food and Natural Resources.

Helgesen cites intellectual curiosity as his reason for departure.

"I've been an administrator for more than 21 years," said Helgesen, "and during that time, I've had to set aside many of my intellectual interests. I look forward to having the time and energy to finally be able to pursue some of those interests in my retirement."

Helgesen praises the campus' dedication to outreach, which he sees as important to the fulfillment of the University's mission.

"I've been very pleased to discover an interest in outreach from all segments of the campus," Helgesen said. "Our outreach opportunities represent not only the University's land-grant interests, but also have the potential to serve as important sources of revenue to augment state funding to the campus."

Holyoke alum named to Bush cabinet

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Elaine Chao just may become the second female graduate of Mount Holyoke College to hold the position of Secretary of Labor for the United States.

President George W. Bush announced on Jan. 12 that Chao, a 1975 Mount Holyoke graduate in economics, would be the new candidate for Secretary of Labor. Chao is not the first alumna to serve in the Cabinet position. She follows in the footsteps of Frances Perkins, a 1902 graduate of the school, who was the first woman ever to hold a Cabinet position under President Franklin D. Roosevelt from 1933 to 1945.

Mount Holyoke College's associate director of communications Kevin McCaffrey did not seem surprised by the nomination explaining that the alumna returned in 1984 to accept the Mary Lyon award from the Alumni Association for her outstanding achievements.

"There is a tradition of public service and leadership here at Mount Holyoke. It is not surprising that we would see this happen," McCaffrey told the Associated Press. "The college is always honored to see its graduates and professors nominated to high profile positions where they can serve the nation."

The nomination has not created a stir in Washington as did Bush's first choice for secretary Linda Chavez, who withdrew her name for the nomination after it was discovered that she provided shelter and financial support for an illegal immigrant who worked in her home. In fact, the nomination has received support from both unions and prominent Democrats.

Senator Edward Kennedy, a Democrat of Massachusetts and temporary chairman of the Senate Health Education and Labor Committee, expressed his feelings about the nomination to the Associated Press.

"I look forward to the [committee's] hearing and to learning more about Ms. Chao's views on how to preserve and advance the interests of working families," said Kennedy.

■ Jackson

COURTESY WORLD WIDE WEB

Revered Jesse Jackson is mobbed by reporters after leaving the Salem Baptist Church in Chicago, Jan. 21 was Jackson's first public appearance since admitting to fathering a child out of wedlock in 1998.

give me and I thank each of them for their grace and understanding throughout this period of tribulation. We have prayed together and through God's grace we have been reconciling."

The news was seemingly a major blow to Jackson's wife, who made comments in 1984 to The Washington Post about the strength of her marriage to Jackson and the high level of trust between them.

"My portion of Jesse Jackson is mine," she said, "and when I say that let me explain: I can't spend too much time worrying about other women if I am to develop myself; then I would be chasing all around this country. I'll tell you, that question bothers me. Don't ask me that ever again."

Jackson also addressed the need for both financial and emotional support for his daughter, empathizing with her situation since he was also the product of an affair.

"I am father to a daughter who was born outside of my marriage. As her mother does, I love this child very much and have assumed responsibility for her emotional and financial support since she was born," he said. "I was born of these circumstances and I know the importance of growing up in a nurturing, supportive and protected environment so I am determined to give my daughter and her mother the privacy they both deserve."

As for financial support, Jackson has been supplying that to Stanford since the child was born paying roughly $3,000 per month in child support, paying out $40,000 in moving costs for her and the child to relocate to California and $35,000 in severance pay from Rainbow/PUSH Coalition.

In addition to her work at the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, Stanford also worked as a college professor for the University of Georgia and wrote a book about Jackson entitled Beyond the Boundaries: Reverend Jesse Jackson and International Affairs.

The announcement has received mixed reactions from the community at large, with positive reactions from both Jackson's congregation and the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition. But the announcement has raised questions about his effectiveness as a leader in the black community and his credibility as a speaker, according to some sources.

Jackson, who was a close personal friend of Martin Luther King Jr. has been an active force in the civil rights movement since 1965. He has run for president twice, is president of the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition an organization that focuses on empowerment, education and the mobilization of minorities and is a published author.

Professor Vincent Moscardelli from the University of Massachusetts political science department felt that Jackson's actions would be damaging to his associates more than to himself.

"He's firmly entrenched, saying things that enough people agree with. His place will remain intact," he said. "It may hurt the chances of people around him."

"It really damages the Rev. Jackson's credibility as a role model for young people, among other things," Clarence Page, a columnist for The Chicago Tribune, told ABC NEWS' Good Morning America. "I think the black community can separate his personal from his public life, but his effectiveness as a mainstream spokesman has been more or less been neutralized."

Jackson's plans have also changed following the announcement. He has decided to move away from the public eye opting to "revive his spirit and reconnect with his family," before returning to his ministry.

Jackson did not attend the much-publicized protest and prayer rally on Jan. 20, in Tallahassee, Florida. The rally championed a cause about which Jackson was very vocal: what he refers to as the disenfranchisement of black voters in the state of Florida. Jackson and other supporters believed that the disregard for black votes likely cost Gore the election. The protest also dealt with the issues of black voter registration and education for minorities on political issues. However, Jackson will return to business as usual this week attending a meeting in New York for his "Wall Street Project," a plan that seeks to build connections between minorities and corporate America.

The full damage of the scandal has yet to be determined and reactions remain mixed about how well he will bounce back from the crisis.

"Reverend Jackson is someone who has preached and talked about the message of redemption, acknowledging that people do make mistakes," said ABC NEWS' political director, Mark Halperin. "But clearly his critics will use this as an opportunity and hope it will be a factor in maybe him scaling back his effectiveness as public spokesman."

treatment equivalent to municipal police in statutes. I've been able to get the bill out of the branch maybe seven times, but it hasn't passed in the other house, it is a real problem."

Union Local 452B of the International Brotherhood of Police Officers at UMass also argued that officers deserve to have educational pay since they perform some of the same tasks and uphold the same laws as the Amherst police officers.

Also seeing pay raises are University Staff Association/Massachusetts Teachers Association and American Federation of State County and Municipal Employees (Local 1776) who will see an added 3 percent raise their Jan. 19 paychecks. Also Massachusetts Society of Professors will see an across the board pay raise in January and Graduate Employees represented by the Graduate Employee Organization/United Auto Workers Local 2232 will also see an across the board increase plus professional development funds retroactive from September of 2000. This was granted due to a new supplementary budget bill.

President of the AFL-CIO John Sweeny also seemed optimistic about the nomination.

"[Chao] has worked with the labor movement and has experience in government, in the private sector and in public service," Sweeney said in a statement.

The nominee served as director of the Peace Corps in 1991 and served as Deputy Transportation Secretary in the administration of former President Bush. She was the president of the United Way of America from 1992-1996 and currently serves as at fellow at a conservative think tank called Heritage Foundation. The 47-year-old is married to Republican Senator Mitch McConnell.

Hokkaido degree bestowed on Scott

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David K. Scott, PhD, M.A. will now add another set of initials after his name.

The Hokkaido University of Sapporo, Japan will bestow an honorary doctor of science degree on Scott on Feb. 7. The degree is part of a celebration commemorating the 125th anniversary of Dr. William Clark's visit to Sapporo.

In 1876, Clark, a president of Massachusetts Agricultural College, set up the Sapporo Agricultural College and served as its first president. Clark modeled the new college on the land grant system used by the M.A.C.

"It is difficult for me to imagine a more active relationship between two universities in different countries than that between Hokkaido University and the University of Massachusetts at Amherst," Scott wrote in a letter to President Norihito Tambo in May of 1999.

Scott will deliver a keynote address at a symposium honoring that relationship.

A similar degree was granted to Tambo in September of 2000 during a ceremony at the William Clark memorial, fashioned in a cityscape of Sapporo, featured highlights of Clark's roles at home and abroad.

"That we honor the beginning of our relationship on its 125th anniversary in the year 2001 with a jointly sponsored conference fits well with our impressive record of scholarly collaboration and exchanges of students and professors," wrote Scott.

The number of exchange programs at the University of Massachusetts has risen by 58 between 1996 and 2000. In addition to the relationship between the universities, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Hokkaido Prefecture have been sister-states for ten years.

"Today, the nations of the world and the world of education are in transformation once again," Scott said. "Few aspects of education are more important than preparing students for full participation in this new world."

Tambo shares Scott's sentiments.

"The challenge at the end of the twentieth century is to overcome the structural stagnation of modern civilization induced by the rapid and huge scale development," he said

Scott's keynote address will be titled "Learning Without Boundaries."

"People usually speak of global issues in economic terms," said Scott, "but it will be global education connecting peoples, cultures, and institutions that will be ultimately be the key to a better world."

Jackson comes clean on illegitimate child

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The Reverend Jesse Jackson has been dealing with a smattering of fall-out ensuing his Jan. 18 announcement that he fathered a 20-month-old illegitimate daughter as the result of an extramarital affair.

The relationship with 39-year-old Karin Stanford a former worker at Rainbow/PUSH Coalition was revealed following threats that The National Enquirer would reveal the details of the affair. Jackson, who served as spiritual advisor for former President Clinton during the revelation of his affair with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky, was having his own affair at the time and invited the fourmonth pregnant Stanford to meet the President.

"He was really one of President Clinton's closest spiritual advisers and really friends through the whole ordeal," said ABC NEWS political analyst George Stephanopoulos. "He went to the White House and prayed with President Clinton. They got down on their knees, we heard, in the residence. He counseled Chelsea and Mrs. Clinton — really became a close friend to the family and they really bonded through this whole ordeal."

Jackson supported Clinton throughout the event both publicly and privately, issuing statements that public officials' private lives should remain in the private sector.

"When we do sin, that's when we have to ask for forgiveness of our sins, because sins do sting when it comes to something as private as sex," Jackson said at the time of the Clinton affair. "I mean he [Clinton] made a great error, but if we have a sense of forgiveness and redemption and perspective as a nation, we will move on."

Expressing a great deal of remorse over his own affair, Jackson began his address straight off by apologizing for his lack of judgment in the matter.

"This is no time for evasions, denials or alibis," he said. "I fully accept responsibility and I am truly sorry for my actions."

He went on to ask for forgiveness from his wife of 38 years and his five children for the trauma that they suffered because of the affair.

"My wife, Jackie, and my children have been made aware of the child and it has been an extremely painful, trying and difficult time for them," Jackson said. "I have asked God and each one of them to for-

The University police ended a long salary battle and were granted a pay increase by Governor Paul Cellucci during winter break.

Police receive pay increase

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

After fighting a three-year long losing battle for the inclusion educational incentive pay, officers at the University of Massachusetts Police Department will be compensated for patrol work on off-campus University property with a salary bonus.

Covered under the compensation is patrolling by officers on UMass property in Belchertown, Deerfield, and Pelham as well as work as special officers in the Amherst community.

Each officer will receive roughly $5,000 each, according to Governor A. Paul Cellucci who signed a budget supplement in late December handing over $377,000 for the officers' compensation. The additional funds cover the three-year contract that the police negotiated with the University two and a half years ago.

Although UMass Police Chief John Luippold cited the additional funds as positive, he expressed dismay at the fact that issue of educational incentive pay was not addressed.

The benefit for officers perusing an associate, bachelors or masters degree in law enforcement was a provision under what is called the Quinn Bill.

The bill faced heavy debate and lingered in the Legislature for over six months due to possible inflated expense and the chance that it might prompt other state or municipal employees to request the same kind of money. One of the biggest opponents of the educational incentive clause was House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Paul Haley.

According to Kim Renzeles an aid to Haley, the bill was held up for so long as a result of Haley's concerns about the specific language of the bill.

She explained that some of the departments that chose to fund the incentive pay would be expected to pay for half of the education costs of the officer while the state would match the funds and pay for the rest of the cost. However, in the case of the UMass Police Department, it would be left up to the state to supply all of the funds for the education of officers. The incentive pay is currently offered to Harvard University Police officers and officers at the Hamden County Correctional Facility.

The bill finally made it through the House, passing in early August. The revised bill only allowed for $399,000 worth of funding coming up $250,000 short of the originally anticipated amount. Educational funding was deleted from the bill.

State Senator Stanley Rosenburg expressed his displeasure in August about the fate of the bill explaining that he felt that the UMass police officers deserved the education incentive.

"Rather than not get any of this done, they decided to leave that [contract provision] in place but not fund it," he explained in a statement to the press. "UMass police have been fighting for years to get equal benefits and

Crouching Tiger redefines storytelling

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

CROUCHING TIGER, HIDDEN DRAGON
Directed by Ang Lee with Chow Yun-Fat, Michelle Yeoh

The technology of film making has progressed to the point where anything a writer or director can dream up, any character or panorama, any conceivable image, can be brought into reality seamlessly and convincingly. Special effects no longer illustrate both their strengths and their weaknesses, as in the black outlines of Star Wars (a product of primitive blue-screening), but melt the real and the imagine - The Matrix and The Cell are both special effects bonanzas, relying more on visual craft than narrative intrigue. Almost as if to compensate for the seamlessness of their effects, however, these movies draw attention to their visual accomplishments, framing them in narcissistic comic book-style vignettes and never letting the audience forget how amazing everything looks. While exciting and entertaining, this sort of recognition-seeking also reestablishes the unreality of what we're seeing, essentially saying "This couldn't happen in real life, but look, it's happening here!"

What sets Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon apart from such contemporaries is its ability to turn its visual trickery into an unassuming part of a rich and narratively interesting world. it isn't a manipulation of reality – it is a new reality.

But perhaps that's getting ahead of things, as there is much more to Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon than special effects.

This is a fairy-tale, essentially, a piece of fantasy anchored in Chinese culture tightly enough to give its world a sense of history and credibility, but loosely enough to allow Western audiences to enjoy it without feeling like ignorant outsiders. Chow Yun-Fat plays Li Mu Bai, a traveling swordsman looking to retire. The theft of his jade sword forces him back into action, along with his fellow warrior and would-be lover Yu Shu Lien (Michelle Yeoh), who has been keeping watch over an unhappy young princess with mysterious abilities. The movie manages to blend several different story arcs and considerable character history together into a script that's neither confusing nor unwieldy. One might easily compare it to The Princess Bride for its elegant mixture of mystery, action and romance.

The cinematography of Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon is breathtaking, treating us to majestic views of oceanic deserts, lush green forests of bamboo, mountain-top monasteries awash in clouds – seldom does director Ang Lee waste our time with an unengrossing shot. The costuming is wonderful; I cannot say if it is authentic, but it certainly feels authentic. Similarly, every other design aspect of the movie has a charm and rightness about it.

The action sequences, however, are certainly the movie's most memorable element. Through the technique of wire-work, by which actors use wires to make incredible leaps, run up walls, and soar over rooftops, Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon is able to invent for Li and Yu fantastic powers and a convincing status as magician-warriors. Excellent displays of martial arts form the foundation of the fights, mixed with superhuman acrobatics and staged in interesting (both visually and schematically) locales. One dual, for instance, takes place amid the tops of swaying trees, the combatants drifting from limb to limb as though nothing were more natural. There is no pounding music, no overacting or surprise on the part of the characters, and no other suggestion that anything is out of place. It is this elegance, this total belief in its own realness, that makes Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon such a successful movie. We can only hope that it will be the first of a new genre of martial arts films rooted in storytelling and exhibiting maturity and restraint in its treatment of action sequences.

Quills revels in brilliant eroticism

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

QUILLS
Directed by Philip Kaufman with Geoffrey Rush, Kate Winslet
Joaquin Phoenix

Sick, unnerving, depraved, all words that can be used to describe the late 18th century period piece, Quills – those and absolutely magnificent.

Quills is undoubtedly a study of the perverse. The movie delights in perversity, especially of the sexual nature. It makes it funny. It makes it horrifying. It makes it empowering and uplifting. Ultimately though, Quills makes perversity universal. What begins as a collection of lewd sexual jokes and quips, often times devilishly charming (see the phallic nature of the title), turns into a poignant and unwavering character study. Never has a movie been more true to, more in tune with, its purpose. Quills never hits a false beat and has a keen, almost wicked, sense of direction. Perhaps that consistent macabre tone is the most impressive achievement of the film.

The story follows the Marquis de Sade (Geoffrey Rush), an author locked away in the loins of a progressive insane asylum. The author's sexually explicit subject matter is smuggled to an outside publisher by a young laundry girl, Madeline (Kate Winslet). This subject matter is also the central pillar of perversity in the film and eventually emanates outward to affect almost every character.

Young Madeline is fascinated by it. She lives vicariously through the Marquis' sluttish characters and loves him, even if only platonically, because of it. However, she must suppress her real sexual desire for the young abbey Coulmier (Joaquin Phoenix). And he must do the same toward her, a task for which he pays an unexpected and cruel penalty that he does not deserve. The abbey meets perversity with the aims to cure it, but does not realize that it lies within all and therefore cannot be cured.

Then, there's the grizzly, embittered old doctor played by Michael Caine. He greets perversity with aims to eradicate it, but does not realize that it lies within him. Eventually, he gains an unexpected and peculiar reward that he does not deserve.

The Marquis' sexual proclivities even come to affect the doctor's young wife, who begins acting on the impure suggestions of the banned author.

Quills can be construed in many ways. I think one could easily dismiss it as a sexual romp, a forum for lewdness and cheap laughs. It can be construed as a study of insanity; it is no coincidence that the film takes place almost exclusively in the asylum. It may even be considered a moral tale of good versus evil - a tale in which the usual winner does not easily triumph, if it does at all. Personally, I think it's all of these and maybe more.

The film is beautifully acted, so much so that the characters seem as enraptured in or horrified by the tale as the audience. Phoenix, who was too immature and insecure in Gladiator for my tastes, does well with the tormented religious abbey. Geoffrey Rush is consummately tragic as the Marquis, especially considering his character's constant mood fluxes. Even Kate Winslet is convincing as the equally tragic young maiden.

Quills is definitely a guilty pleasure – for what it offers and where it takes you. It presents a series of quirky characters with very real, at times, very tragic problems. Then, it takes the audience on a quirky adventure with enough twists to satisfy any appetite. The movie succeeds in every facet that it attempts – humor, horror, pathos, drama, redemption, resolve, etc. One of the year's best films.

Coen brothers craft an intriguing but flawed fable from Homer's classic

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

O BROTHER, WHERE ART THOU?
Directed by Joel Coen with George Clooney, John Turturro, Tim Blake Nelson

The Coen brothers are masters of tone. As interesting as their characters and stories may be, these elements will always play second fiddle to the overriding feel of a Coen brothers movie, the peculiar universe – slightly but perceptibly different from our own – that the movie inhabits. Fargo was as much a study of the feel of backwater Minnesota as it was as story of two unbalanced criminals.

In this sense, O Brother, Where Art Thou? is an excellent achievement; with it, Joel and Ethan Coen have transformed 1930s Mississippi into a visually enchanting landscape inhabited by a host of characters that walk out of the scenery as if materializing out of the essence of that scenery. Every field, every stretch of railroad has a near-magic about it that saturates the film and creates for it a world approximating a historic American south while at the same time existing just outside of the parameters of strict reality. It is, simply put, a storybook world, drawing from Americana but ultimately resting on its own cleverly spun foundation.

Supporting this world, and adding immense appeal and charm is the movie's soundtrack, an excellent collection of old southern folk, gospel and bluegrass. Very few films manage to use music as so effective an anchor, and the perfection of its use here further intensifies the Coens' world.

The story for O Brother, Where Art Thou? was drawn from Homer's The Odyssey and transposed onto the tale of three chain gang escapees. While fleeing the law the three men, led by the aptly-named Ulysses Everett McGill (George Clooney), stumble from one bizarre encounter to another, most of them traceable to chapters of The Odyssey. These episodes are sewn together haphazardly, and anyone expecting a faithful adaptation of Homer's epic will be disappointed. In fact, anyone expecting linearity and purpose will be disappointed, which points toward O Brother, Where Art Thou?'s greatest weakness: while individual characters and events may be interesting and entertaining, there's no real overriding design, no sense of momentum. The three criminals are too comical to be tragic, and the film's world is too idiosyncratic to carry any social or political weight. With such an absence of structure, the movie takes on the feel of a traveling carnival, a collection of fascinating booths that offer everything but real substance.

Considering the brilliance with which the Coens crafted the film's setting, this narrative deficiency is especially disappointing: O Brother, Where Art Thou? becomes merely a comedy, albeit a wonderfully located comedy.

So it

it funny? Mostly. The movie's extreme stylization extends to the humor, creating a campy, manic rhythm that depends more on the goofy unreality of the characters than modern ironic humor. George Clooney's characterization of Ulysses as a bumbling romantic with a hails affected vocabulary and an arsenal of wide-eyed overreactions is either funny or it isn't; he doesn't deliver jokes so much as he is the joke, and if you don't get it you'll find the act quickly tiring. The other two escapees (played by John Turturro and Tim Blake Nelson) are equally cartoonish. Apart from the hit-or-miss appeal of the characters, however, the acting is excellent all around, supported by John Goodman as a one-eyed scam artist and Holly Hunter as Ulysses's estranged wife.

O Brother, Where Art Thou? lost as balanced and consistent as Fargo, but where it shines it shines with brilliance.

Badly Drawn Boy releases gem of indie-rock soulsearching

BADLY DRAWN BOY
The Hour of Bewilderbeast
XL/Beggars

COURTESY DEBRA SANTINI

Art-rocker Damon Gough, aka Badly Drawn Boy.

Badly Drawn Boy, a.k.a. Damon Gough, has made an outstanding album with his debut The Hour of Bewilderbeast, but it's as if he doesn't want you to know it. Like splashing paint on the Mona Lisa causing onlookers to twist and squint to catch a glimpse of the beauty behind the mess, this album uses a variety of smoke screens to mask its brilliance. Everything from a bloated track list and running time to off putting production methods act like a cloud that Gough's beams of melody and songwriting skills are trying to shine through. Even the portrait of the artist is one of mystery, as he is usually seen sporting a rugged beard and a never removed knit cap. Like Kurt Cobain's fear of being seen as some overblown rock god, Badly Drawn Boy's quiet, introverted appearance and method of presentation for his talent happily put blanket after blanket over his pop sense, ensuring its a treasure that is quested for and found, rather than put on garish display.

But occasionally Gough lets himself go and throws out a straight pop song free of all the chains that would hold it back. The excellent "Once Around the Block" is such a song. An eloquent love song analyzing the rights and wrongs on both sides of a relationship, it's not hard to find quotes from the mesmerizing poetry. "Now I see the vision through your eyes/ Your innocence no longer fuels surprise." As melancholy as the lyrics may be at times, the feel is definitely optimistic, and even gives way to some "doo be da" scatting at the end. He's sure not to let things get too out of hand, however, opting (as in "Smells Like Teen Spirit") to play his vocal line rather than a guitar solo and coaxing some carefully chimes sounds out of a vibraphone, ensuring that if radio does get a hold of the song they'll be scratching their heads to figure out what the hell's that sound.

"Once Around the Block" is a lot like one of the blown-up photos in the booklet. All of the photos inside the booklet are magnified versions of pieces of the collage that graces the cover. The cover photo is a super-detailed hodgepodge of old records, candles, old photos, and other knick knacks. When Gough zooms in and there's nothing to hear but the song, gems like "Once Around the Block" and "This Song" are revealed. Much of the time though, there are so many instruments (a great number played by Gough himself) and rhythm changes that it's hard to establish a groove to nestle into, and it's easy to feel disoriented and unsatisfying. Why does "I all in a River" have to sound like it's coming from underwater and then stop abruptly for the sound of what is probably someone actually falling in a river? Why does "This Song," with its beautiful lyrics, have to be distorted and annoying?

These are questions one might find themselves asking, and while repeated listenings of the disc cure almost all ails, some aspects remain grating. But the variety really is a virtue, and keeps the material fresh. After all, this nit-picking is done mostly to find some sort of fault with a masterpiece of an album, one that keeps getting better as time goes on. Slow, wounded ballads like "The Shining" are even more convincing with a french horn and a cello, aspects of the musicianship throughout the record that is unimpeachable and stands as tall as Gough's lyrics; no easy task. The guitar-driven, faster rock songs "Everybody's Stalking" and "Disillusion" are among the most enduring; don't rock for change's sake, they do so with purpose. "Disillusion" is simply jubilant with handclapping and a friendly riff, while "Everybody's Stalking" can't quite decide whether it's a tongue-in-cheek stalker fantasy like Iron Maiden's "Prowler" or a roundabout love song.

Either way, it's amazing. Gough is clearly living and breathing music, and The Hour of Bewilderbeast is a brush with his talent that should be appreciated, not only by fans but the music community at large, especially popular music currently that now more than ever needs a serious musician to shake its hollow bones. Badly Drawn Boy is like the stalker in "Everybody's Stalking," following the popular music scene closely, ready to inject some life and meaning, since "Baby all I need/ you need too/ Don't wait for me/ i'll wait for you."

Fresh pop from Frank Black

FRANK BLACK AND THE CATHOLICS
Dog in the Sand
What Are Records

The Pixies sang a song about the University of Massachusetts, lovingly still listened to by people who never really escaped the late 80's, early 90's bang of college alt-rock. For them, their tastes were exposed in the same sudden moment that Nirvana burst onto a scene and led with it bands that had nothing to do with them, the Breeders, Ned's Atomic Dustbin and, perhaps, if only slightly, the Pixies.

But that band broke up eventually, leaving the various members to scatter into the winds like fluff from a dandelion – bassist Kim Deal joined the aforementioned Breeders, and the lead singer, a charismatic former Pentecostal Christian, Black Francis, changed his name and thus, Frank Black.

He formed a new band, the Catholics, and has since released several acclaimed albums, Pistolero included, but on his newest record Dog in the Sand, Black harkens back to a sound and a feeling like Lou Reed before him, with a distorted sound and a distorted mind – It's also perhaps his smoothest album. It's got a brilliant pop feel, but maintains, as was quoted on a fan site, an alternative credibility in a world where alternative tends to mean Third Eye Blind.

With tight three to four minute songs, Black makes a slight 50's sound on the two and a half minute "Stupid Me" powerful and a seven minute tour-de-force that doesn't overwhelm on "Blast Off." But while those songs allow Black's considerable pop skill to diversify, mid-range songs like "Bullet," country-surf feel, gravelly voice and all is a true gem on an album of rubies. "I'll Be Blue" is a bluesy exploration, a tense sound of sorrow and pain, a whiff of Neil Young in his voice, in which Black explains his coldness in the face of someone who loves him.

Not everything hits, (does it ever really?) especially "If It Takes All Night" which doesn't feel right. Black's voice hits high notes it was never meant to and he pulls back on the curtain on the dark side of that early 90's sound that some still worship like it was an Aztec god: whininess. For no other reason, a man's high voice in anything but a Styx record just doesn't feel right.

But hey, what's one song, especially in the face of "Llano Del Rio"? With a decidedly southern twang in the guitars, his song of some southwestern heaven is an escape for Frank Black, like someone revealing that he can escape the Christianity, the pain and the occasional bitterness that he and the people that have surrounded him are associated with.

This whole album plays similarly; it's a pop album that occupies some hallowed ground in a world of Britney Spears and Backstreet Boys, and while it can't replace those two or their ilk, it certainly is a solid album from a man with a fantastic background who, as he ages, like a fine Chablis, gets better.

The Haunted return minus Dolving

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

THE HAUNTED
The Haunted Made Me Do It
Earache

Sweden's The Haunted is a band that simply has metal written into their DNA. And it's the kind of metal that hardheaded metalheads define as "real" metal, as in straightforward, dark, fast, heavy, ear-bleeding metal. Their sound is dark, but not silly Goth dark or sleep-inducing gloom. They're fast, Slayer-fast, the band one would assume is their biggest influence, but don't abuse the double bass drum or blast-beats and bring it to ridiculous grind-core levels of unintentional humor. They're so sleek and professional it may leave fans of a rougher, more authentic, sound deached from the album, but there's undoubtedly a spirit of passion for metal here that can't be denied.

The Haunted's eponymous 1998 debut was one of the highlights in a banner year for metal. Insane riffs and energy propelled the album, but in no way sacrificing melody on song structures. The clincher was the amazing vocals of Peter Dolving, whose style was screaming but screaming from an undeniably talented vocalist, and he mixed his belting out with eerie spoken word and commanding choruses. The album's lyrics dealt with essentially the same concepts that are presented on the new album, namely a contempt for organized religion and a fascination with murder, death, and the mind of a killer. Songs like "Chasm" and "In Vein" from the debut are built upon to make the entire theme for the new album, the inventively titled The Haunted Made Me Do It.

The album completely embraces the killer theme. The title humorously pokes fun at the "music motive" that people claim can incite violence, the cover art is a blood stain and pictures of high profile killers, and the lyrics are laid out like the wall of an obsessed killer complete with knives, bullets, and choking wire.

First thing out of the way, the band suffers without Dolving. Marcus Arvio is the new singer, and he brings a slightly more traditional death metal growl/shriek to the group, and while he sounds very passionate and is steps above many death metal singers, Dolving's shoes are simply too big to fill completely.

Thankfully, the album is still amazing. The lyrics haven't suffered due to Dolving's departure, and the morbid but spiritual feel has been maintained.

The spite for religion is as eloquent as always, if not more so. "Encircled by a deceitful light, / You escape the harsh reality. / Live sheltered from the awful truths" states "Revelation," as thought-provoking an indictment of religion as any. The music throughout isn't what I would call creative, but these are obviously masters working within their trade. The riffs are plentiful and inventive, and the time shifts keep the songs on their toes. Blast beats and insane double bass drum action is here, but in digestible amounts, and the consistency of the music saves the tracks that might not match up to others lyrically. "The World Burns" has an uninspiring apocalypse theme, but the soaring solos and abundance of riffs ensure you won't be skipping over it.

In what has been a somewhat slow and depressing year for metal, The Haunted has crafted one of the best albums of the year, inside and outside the genre. Quality metal still exists, even if one has to go halfway across the world to find it.

Not so new kid on the block: X to the Z teams with Dre for Restless

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

XZIBIT
Restless
Loud Records

"Make no mistake/ I'm the Golden State heavyweight/ Being underrated gave me time to create."

Whether he was being underrated or just being completely ignored, Xzibit wants the entire world to know that he's ready to collect on the mass-produced respect so recently reserved for Dr. Dre, Snoop Dogg, and Slim Shady.

Restless is Xzibit's first effort since the incredibly successful Up In Smoke tour from this past summer, where he was given the opportunity to collaborate with the previously mentioned rappers. The album displays a wealth of raw emotion mixed with undeniable egotism.

With a very strong supporting cast and production credits by music legend Dr. Dre, Xzibit's new album is able to please even the most casual of rap fans. The record is enjoyable and strives for intensity at every turn. Songs like the first single "X" have easy radio acceptability and abundantly repeated lyrics for recognition. On that particular song he collaborates with superstar Snoop Dogg to give fans something extra and even more familiar.

For hardcore rap fans, Restless delivers as well. Using already set paths from Dr. Dre and KRS-1, Xzibit finds himself so supported by such enormous previous success that it would be impossible not to succeed. This pedigree also helps him achieve near flawlessness. Dre knows what works and what does not. In the same respect, he knows what sells and what does not.

More than anything, there is a very strong influence from Eminem's The Marshall Mathers LP. A lot of the album sounds exactly like the things that Eminem did with his enormous achievement (or disgusting failure, depending on how you look at it), and never is this more evident than on "Don't Approach Me," the song on Restless where Xzibit joins forces with Eminem. The song sounds like any given track on The Marshall Mathers LP, and is easily the best on the album. Restless is moderately less offensive than Eminem's material, but with songs about disrespecting women and challenging anyone who Xzibit thinks has been an obstacle in his road for stardom, he comes off being quite annoying at times.

From the beginning of the album we see the narcissistic extravaganza that has plagued the music industry for decades. After the annoying "We love Xzibit," intro, in which fans talk about how incredible he is, we hear Xzibit make hundreds of references to how he should be king of the music world and everyone should accept him as none other. Each song packs an intentionally direct punch delivered by a fist of self-gratification.

Restless is not astonishing, but it is an extremely worthy opponent for any of the recent releases. Watch for Xzibit's moderate success that he's had in the past to jolt into prominence while he rides on the shoulders of his idols and inspirations. If nothing else, the album is a very good beginning from a musician that has ironically been around for a long time.

Collective Soul plumbs the depths of rock mediocrity with Blender

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

COLLECTIVE SOUL
Blender
Atlantic Records

Collective Soul has long occupied one of the barely-outer orbits of mainstream rock, occasionally enjoying a radio hit, but seldom achieving startling critical praise or sales. Blender is their fifth studio effort, and, predictably, it gestures towards progressive trends in rock while remaining rooted in band leader Ed Roland's largely forgettable songwriting.

Blender kicks off with "Skin," which in turn kicks off with a so-so guitar hook it refuses to abandon. The song's raucous combination of "hey"s and heavy, percussive guitar attacks help to offset its one-chord monotony, but even that energy feels shallow, and the song loses its charm surprisingly quickly. "Vent" doesn't help things much, being another forward-looking but backward-rooted rocker that depends too heavily on novel guitar sounds to compensate for its simple structure.

"Why pt.2," the album's first single, takes things up a notch in the songwriting quality department, but does so at the cost of revisiting the band's older material, notwithstanding the slightly trippy lead guitar work. It's not a bad song, but it's not a particularly interesting song either, and therein lies Collective Soul's perpetual rut.

Blender's fourth track, "10 Yrs Later," sounds suspiciously like a rewrite of their last album's "Run," made a hit by the Varsity Blues soundtrack. Again, there's nothing especially wrong with the song; a soothing acoustic guitar mixes with spacey guitar leads and a mellow, inviting pace. Listening to it once, perhaps twice, however, one already feels entirely familiar with the song and ready to move on to different things.

The album continues through seven more tunes, all of them polished and thoughtful enough that it pains me to admit how forgettable most of them are. The band is obviously talented and experienced at constructing enjoyable pop-rock songs, even if they generally follow other bands' footsteps instead of branching out on their own. Roland is gifted with a plastic voice that can be harnessed for both caressing and snarling, and writes solid melodies (even if his lyrics aren't much worth thinking about). Drummer Shane Evans deserves a lot of credit for energizing the band's heavier tunes, which otherwise might lean towards terminal blandness.

Highlights include "Boast," which moves between sunny, poppy verses and choruses ripe with juicy riffing – the two halves feel fairly violently thrust together, but the result is more engaging than off-putting – and "Perfect Day," another good-vibes tune punctuated by irresistible melodies and some great piano work courtesy of Elton John.

Also of note is the band's cover of "You Speak My Language," originally written by the late Mark Sandman, singer and two-string slide bassist for the incomparable Boston rock band Morphine. Collective Soul takes the song's already energetic structure and turns it into a full-bore rocker, helping to add some pep to the second half of Blender, which leans too heavily towards the gentile. Also helping this cause is the album's closer, "Happiness," which sounds like a slightly faster, slightly more futuristic version of "Heavy," another successful single off of Dosage.

Is Blender a bad album? Certainly not. It's sure to please fans, and may earn some well-deserved radio time. At the same time, however, it must be admitted that it offers very few truly engaging moments, moving rock nowhere new and tossing out more than its share of boring riffs and uninspired songwriting.

Blender is Collective Soul's latest amble through easily digested rock.

Finding Forrester is a satisfying, if safe, mentor story with excellence from Connery

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

FINDING FORRESTER
Directed by Gus Van Sant with Sean Connery

To deny that Finding Forrester is at least partially a recapitulation of Good Will Hunting would be futile. Both films are directed by Gus Van Sant. Both films feature relative newcomers as abnormally intelligent youths (Robert Brown in the former and Matt Damon in the latter). And both films feature aging actors with juicy roles as the youth's mentor (Robin Williams in GWH and Sean Connery here).

However, to deny that Finding Forrester is not an engaging and charming film would be equally futile.

While Good Will Hunting focused on the personal neuroses of the titular character and the people who try to help him, in Finding Forrester, these problems lie almost exclusively with the mentor. Sean Connery, in perhaps his most engaging role ever, plays William Forrester, a recluse author whose one novel and subsequent disappearance remain the talk of academia twenty years later. He overlooks a small Bronx neighborhood from his apartment where he remains a mystery to the boys below.

The relationship with Jamal Wallace (Robert Brown) develops when the boy loses some of his writing notebooks after breaking into Forrester's apartment on a bet. And it is in this relationship that the film flourishes. The grumpy, omniscient Forrester plays well off the naive, honest Jamal. The two exchange writing samples and verbal barbs as they grow close to one another. And as in Good Will Hunting, the student helps the teacher almost as much as the teacher helps the student, perhaps more here. The film's best scenes undoubtedly unfold in the cramped space of Forrester's apartment. It's the outside world where the film stumbles somewhat.

The conflict of the movie arises when Jamal begins attending a posh private school across town. Here, the movie tries to delve into social and class issues, but largely fails. Quite frankly, Jamal is too talented to succumb to the narrow-mindedness of his new setting. He's smarter than his professors, including a Professor Crawford (F. Murray Abraham), who becomes the movie's main villain and Jamal's only nemesis. Plus, he's the school's new star basketball player, which endears him to those in power. Jamal never seems challenged in the movie, except by personal demons of his brother and his father, which are mentioned only in passing.

Nonetheless, the mentor/student relationship keeps the film interesting and genuine. Like Robin Williams, Connery might just grab an Oscar nod for his whimsical performance.

Robert Brown hides under a purple ski hat and behind a pair of placid brown eyes for his impressive screen debut. Brown is fresh and more than holds his own in scenes with his elder, more experienced counterparts. In many ways, Brown treats the movie set with the same reserve and level-headedness that Jamal treats his world.

And Gus Van Sant obviously has a knack for directing these films

Van Sant, who is always fascinated by how setting affects his characters (South Boston in GWH or the Northwest in My Private Idaho or the Bronx here) does a marvelous job establishing Jamal in his home and his normal Bronx neighborhood before throwing him into the new school and the new intellectual realm. The movie has an intimate familiar feel to it, demonstrated perhaps no better than in the final shot. Even if the movie runs long, allowing for a Matt Damon cameo and the homage to GWH, the final scene of two friends playing basketball on the Bronx court is stark, but beautifully stunning.

It's perhaps unfair for me to judge Finding Forrester on Good Will Hunting is my favorite movie ever and I judge any attempts to equal it with skepticism and suspicion of futility. However, I enjoyed Finding Forrester a lot. It may not be as well written or as well structured or even as well acted as GWH, but the two leads and a director treading familiar territory make it a quite inviting, warm-hearted film.

TRAFFIC
Directed by Steven Soderbergh with Michael Douglas, Benicio Del Toro, Catherine Zeta-Jones

Hollywood has increasingly become forgetful, willfully or otherwise, of the role of art as a powerful vehicle for social criticism.

Despite whatever economic hiccoughs may have been brought on by a presidential election, the most visible and politically economically potent slice of America – the white suburban middle and upper-class – has little reason to fret over society's failings; things are working out fine enough for them. In such a situation as this, people turn towards art that entertains them without suggesting that anything may be wrong with the world. The movie industry makes most of its money off of these customers, and they know it, and so accordingly they produce pieces of distracting fluff. It may even be excellently crafted distracting fluff (Shakespeare in Love, Cider House Rules), but fluff it is, and fluff will never fill the necessary role of social critic.

It is this environment that makes Traffic such a refreshing movie, and a reminder of film's status as the most under-harnessed of all vehicles for cultural exploration.

Catherine Zeta-Jones wades into a moral quagmire.

Benicio Del Toro copes with the ubiquitous corruption of the Mexican police.

COURTESY IMDB.COM

Traffic blends together, with differing degrees of fluidity and coherence, four different storylines, all dealing with the trafficking of illegal drugs across the Mexico/U.S. border. Michael Douglas leads an excellent ensemble cast as Robert Wakefield, the newly appointed U.S. drug czar whose assumption of the role of commander-in-chief of America's War on Drugs coincides with the discovery that his daughter is a heroin addict. Catherine Zeta-Jones plays a housewife who discovers that her family's material comfort comes courtesy of her husband's status as drug trade kingpin; after his arrest she slides, with frightful ease, into the his role. The couple is being pursued by a pair of DEA agents (Don Cheadle and Luis Guzmán). Meanwhile, Mexican police officer Javier Rodriguez (Benicio Del Toro) tries to cope with his own temptations in a world of lawless lawmen.

These stories intersect at times, giving the film fleeting bits of cohesion; generally, however, it falls on the audience to juggle mentally four different sets of characters and circumstances. This proves too tall an order at times, and the Rodriguez storyline especially often leaves the audience wondering what's going on.

Director Steven Soderbergh lends the audience a hand at times through visual conventions; for instance, all scenes in Mexico are shot in a hazy, yellow-washed style, and Wakefield's storyline is glazed in a visually muffling blue-white sheen. Traffic's tendency toward indie-style visuals begs comparison to Three Kings, and although it may be impossible to intuit precisely what Soderbergh intends with each stylized shot, the final result is a film of intelligence and artistic substance.

The need for four nearly independent storylines comes from the filmmakers' obvious desire not to take a side in the issue. Traffic does not condemn the War on Drugs, nor does it endorse it; similarly, drug traffickers are depicted neither as devils nor simple capitalists. The movie's clearest intention is to alert the audience to the degree to which illegal drugs have infiltrated our society, and allow us the freedom to act or sit complacently.

Traffic is not a flawless movie; it can be unwieldy and confusing, visually indulgent, and the dialogue tends toward the over-dramatic. What it lacks in the particulars, however, it more than makes up for in intention and intelligence.

Matt Damon tames the West in All The Pretty Horses.

Horses needs faster pace

By Adam Martignetti

ALL THE PRETTY HORSES
Directed by Billy Bob Thornton with Matt Damon, Penelope Cruz

Cormac McCarthy's novel, All the Pretty Horses, is not only a beautifully written, romantic piece of Faulkneresque prose, but also one that tackles many classic Western themes. Not the least of these themes is the disappearing frontier. In the book, John Grady Cole sets off for Mexico with his best friend Lacey Rawlings after his grandfather dies and his mother sells the family ranch. When he returns to Texas, things are not quite, and can never be, the same again; the frontier has already started to be closed.

The movie's screenplay starts in a similar place, but ends somewhere altogether different. The panoramic vistas and wide-angle shots are supposed to compensate for McCarthy's love of the land, which is almost completely written out of the script. Rather, the movie focuses on the determination and honor of Grady Cole (Matt Damon) as he ventures into this new culture.

All the Pretty Horses is an old-fashioned movie, and, as such, operates on a different set of codes than most films. Cole is the epitome of these codes – of honor, of loyalty, of friendship. So, when the two friends meet the young cowboy Blevins on their way to Mexico, Cole cannot refuse to help him. Later, he cannot help but to avenge the boy's death. Cole lives by these Western codes, and in sense, they are what All the Pretty Horses is about.

In Mexico, Cole and Lacey (Henry Thomas) find work at a large ranch owned by the powerful Don Hector Rocha y Villareal. When Cole begins to fall in love with Don Hector's daughter Alejandra (Penelope Cruz), he discovers that cultural codes must keep them apart. And he is eventually betrayed by the family, accused of a crime that he did not commit, because of his failure to abide by these codes.

All the Pretty Horses is also an old-fashioned love story – taken right out of the Romeo and Juliet model. While it may not be the most well developed relationship in cinematic history, it is a refreshing break from the recent slew of (non) romantic, Hollywood dramas.

All in all, I didn't think All the Pretty Horses was a bad movie, or even a bad adaptation. I understand the need to cut from a novel to fit a story into a neat two-hour package. The focus on Cole's honor made sense, even if the latter part of the film was a complete fabrication. The idea of a man living by a different set of codes than most underlies many Westerns and is at least a part of people's fascination with the "cowboy." The movie was admittedly slow-paced, but I think the technique also serves the genre well.

In fact, director Billy Bob Thornton has a profound understanding of the genre. He accomplishes a lot with a look or a glance or a camera angle. He uses silence and subtly to amazingly effective lengths. He gets great performances from all of his actors, including a toned-down Matt Damon. My only problem is that the spectacular panoramic shots, the majesty of the West may be a bit too clean, too pretty to suit the movie. The setting, in some ways, betrays the time period and as a consequence, the story as well. It's hard for these different cultural codes to operate when it seems as if the story unfolds in present day.

All the Pretty Horses is a valiant attempt and, I think, a decent movie; however, its non-Hollywood style and slow pacing are unlikely to endear it to mainstream audiences.

Blanchett saves The Gift from itself

By Adam Mortignetti
Collegian Staff

THE GIFT
Directed by Sam Raimi with Cate Blanchett, Katie Holmes, Keanu Reeves

Katie Holmes may have all in Sam Raimi's latest thriller, The Gift, but Cate Blanchett steals the show.

In the type of psychic thriller it is often too easy for films to tread the fine line between raw or captivating and downright cheesy. In fact, most fall into the latter category. I can with the cool hand of experience offer Bill Bob Thornton at the helm. The Gift faces this problem more than once. There is perhaps one too many clairvoyant flashbacks, one too many scenes with horrifying visions, one too many extended periods of silence peppered by the sudden appearance of a non-threatening character and some bad music. However, Cate Blanchett's Oscar-worthy performance gives the movie a very genuine sense of human emotion, and saves The Gift from ever reaching the ranks of its peers.

Blanchett plays Annie Wilson, a single mother trying to raise three children after her husband's tragic death. To raise money, Annie uses her psychic sense to "give readings" to a typically quirky cast of characters in a small southern town. There's Donnie Barksdale (Keanu Reeves in a kind of barbaric role that suits him), the town drunk who beats his wife (Hilary Swank), one of Annie's frequent customers. There's Buddy Cole (Giovanni Ribisi), a local mechanic who visits Annie to overcome mental instability and past demons. And of course, there's the local school principal Wayne Collins (Greg Kinnear) who's unknowingly about to marry the town skank Jessica King (Katie Holmes).

Cate Blanchett carries The Gift with a stellar performance.

When Jessica shows up missing and the police find no leads, her rich daddy turns to Annie for some help on the case. The rest of the story follows Annie's experiences as her visions affect the investigation.

What makes The Gift work is exactly that: Annie's experiences. Annie's fragility (amazingly conveyed by Blanchett) dominates the film. She provides a sense of normalcy in a place where oddity and bizarreness rule. I would even argue that any of the film's tension or scary moments are a direct result of Annie's insecurities and Blanchett's ability to elicit them so convincingly.

Billy Bob, who does this kind of small town movie well (see Slingblade and the recently shelved Daddy and Them) provides enough distractions and enough motives to keep the movie fairly interesting and the mystery fairly fresh. And even if you guess the identity of the perpetrator, the ending — small details and all — is tied up fairly nicely. It's one of the few instances that I can remember being satisfied by the ending of a movie in this genre.

Sam Raimi (whose credits fluctuate wildly) tries to recapture the atmospheric tension which made 1998's A Simple Plan an unrealized gem. He has mild success here, hitting all the expected marks. He can perhaps be most credited with keeping the movie moving forward during a time when it seems to be over.

The bottom line, however, is that The Gift simply does not work without Cate Blanchett. She's absolutely enchanting as the lead character and almost single-handedly makes the movie a worthwhile, enjoyable effort.

Rodney Dangerfield plunges to new levels of comedic vulgarity

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

MY 5 WIVES
Directed by Sidney J. Furie with Rodney Dangerfield, John Pinette, Molly Shannon, Andrew Dice Clay

You know what's wrong with the Mormon religion? There's not enough Rodney Dangerfield! At least that's what the creators of My 5 Wives would have you believe.

That's right, Rodney Dangerfield is back and older than ever. Here's a rhetorical question: why is Rodney still making movies? He's a walking dead man still blessed with the ability to make more penis jokes than all of the Howard Sterns and Bob Sagets of the world combined. It seems like every single film Rodney has starred in has been exactly the same thing with different actors. That's really scary considering he made Ladybugs, a children's movie.

With his latest effort, Dangerfield has decided to skip the pesky ritual of going to a theater, and put his foot in the door of the struggling world of straight to video films. Until now, that entire field has been ruled by the dark overlord known as porn, but move over spanking material, there's a new pimp in town.

COURTESY MYLES ARONOWITZ/NEW LINE CINEMA

Regardless, My 5 Wives is nothing short of a masterpiece. The opening scene is a wealth of crappy Dangerfield gags that we've heard time and time again, only with different words. "We have the most careful drivers in Los Angeles," Dangerfield says. "They all use hand signals. Everyone gives you the finger!" (Insert Ryan's uproarious laughter).

The film is the story of Monty Peterson, who just can't seem to stop getting married. I know, much like annoying phone solicitors and genital crabs, it's a problem most can't seem to shake. "Monty Peterson is the victim," his lawyer proclaims. "The victim of a woman who was never in love with him, but was in love with his money!" This statement alone was enough to appall me. Every single marriage that I've seen between a twenty-five year old woman and an eighty year-old man has been for nothing other than sheer companionship, emotions and affection.

Peterson gets lucky in a different way when he finds an opportunity to inherit the land of a recently deceased man in Utah. The only catch is that in order to become the official owner, he must turn into a Mormon and inherit the man's three wives as well. I learned in my Intro to Legal Studies class that this is a pretty common clause in most documents in the United States now. I can imagine the writers, sitting at a table, coming up with this idea. Talentless hack number one: "Hey Jim, do you know anything about Mormon culture?" Worthless excuse for a writer number two: "I think they're allowed to marry a whole bunch of women at one time. Maybe Rodney Dangerfield's four fans will get a kick out of that!"

Sadly, the disrespect to Mormons continues throughout this film. "I remember the words of Brigham Young," Peterson says, "I don't care how you bring em' just bring em' young!" It's a good thing Rodney doesn't remember the words of Martin Luther King Jr. or Jesus Christ.

Some of the film hits reality right on the head though. Peterson's personal agent says to him, "You better get some sleep, you look exhausted." Yeah, well you'd look pretty tired too if you were 105 years old and still making Oscar-quality pictures.

On a lighter note, it was nice to see John Pinette (best known for eating everything in sight and joking about it) doing something other than headlining Comedy Night at the Huki Lau in Chicopee. He never gets the respect that an international treasure like he should. He finally did with this film. His character snaps a Polaroid of a man smoking and drinking beer while taking a dump.

Of course, what would a Rodney Dangerfield film be without women? The three (and eventually it becomes five) women that play Peterson's wives are walking funbags. They are there simply for ridicule. When the three women are introduced as Peterson's inheritance, all I can remember thinking is, "I didn't realize that silicone was such a big part of Mormon culture." The women who play Peterson's wives are so bad at acting they make Jenna Jameson look like Meryl Streep.

Peterson has legitimate complaints about his marriage, though. "I've got three wives, and none of them can cook," he says. He needs to buy a turn-a-matic from the deli, so each woman can take a number, so she knows when it's her time to have sex with him. Apparently there is an upside to being a Mormon. "You know what the best part about having three wives is?" Peterson asks. "They can't all have a headache at once!" (Again insert Ryan's uproarious laughter. This time with a touch of 'I have no life' shame).

My Five Wives also boasts a return to the screen by family film favorite Andrew Dice Clay. Ironically, Clay plays a crime boss. One of his more illustrious moments in the film is when he is outside Peterson's house, trying persuade Peterson to let him in. "I gotta use the bathroom really bad," he screams. "Don't make me pee on your car." Brilliant!

Some of Dangerfield's jokes are so markedly predictable that you wonder why the even bothered to finish them. What does the big hole in the wall remind him to do? "See his proctologist," of course. What does the cumquat pie need? "Less cum and more quat!" (Insert what you think would be Ryan's uproarious laughter, but actually it's his squeal after slitting his own throat).

After his brief bout in Utah is over, Dangerfield says of Mormon culture, "It was fun while it lasted." Right, just like a trip to the zoo.

Of course the film ends with penis joke number 3,432, and the mindless lunatics who dropped four bucks at the video store turn the VCR off and go back to picking their nose, reading playboy and wondering why they don't have girlfriends. (Insert a picture of Ryan picking his nose, reading playboy and wondering why he doesn't have a girlfriend).

If you really want to listen to some elderly man babble about sex, and make dirty jokes, go visit your grandfather. Don't waste hard earned beer money on this piece of crap that is simply way too racist, sexist and outright offensive than it truly has the ability to fathom.

Aging blues man crafts stunning album

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

R.L. BURNSIDE
Wish I Was In Heaven Sitting Down
Fat Possum Records

With perhaps the saddest single on what may be the saddest album released last year, R.L. Burnside's stunning Wish I Was In Heaven Sitting Down is a bluesy stunner with the right mix of blues, scratching, technodica, and a Burnside's own sandy voice.

Burnside, a 74-year-old blues man from Chicago and Mississippi, isn't afraid to try new things, and some of his biggest achievements have come after he turned 70, no small task in today's fickle world of music. He toured with the Jon Spencer Blues Explosion, released Ass Pocket of Whiskey, and later worked with Beck and Elliot Smith producer Tom Rothrock. He also spun a song for "The Sopranos," perhaps the biggest pop-culture phenomenon since "Seinfeld." Needless to say, not too shabby for an artist in his mid-70's who never really achieved any sort of acclaim until he was much closer to death than he was to birth.

His latest release isn't perfect, but it sure tries to be. "Hard Time Killing Floor" is the aforementioned saddest song of last year, a slow-rolling story of his brother's death and his need to escape a crazy world. "The hard times will kill you/ yes I know/ I will tell you just before I go/ these hard times will kill you/ yes I know." He sounds so sad as he sings, so pained, so lost, and when he isn't singing, he literally moans to the guitar's chord, a man suffering while asleep. The song isn't just the saddest of the year; such a platitude takes something away from the genuine emotion in his voice, his shock at such a cruel world. He wants retribution, something better.

COURTESY THE WORLD WIDE WEB

R.L. Burnside continues to sharpen his talent for generating new music.

But while living with his pain, he teases happiness or playfulness, asking on "Miss Maybelle" if he's allowed to be this woman's "hopping frog." DJ Swamp on the turntables behind Burnside is a subtle edition; he's able to blend into the Burnside's sound, not overwhelm it with his own tabletop mastery. In "Nothing Man" he honestly, with a traditional hint of sarcasm, suggests his current condition, and on his cover of Aretha Franklin's "Chain of Fools" he isn't as good as she was, but he's certainly acceptable enough. But in all of that, he can't cover his pain.

"R.L.'s Story" is his discussion of his life, the death of five siblings in Chicago, two uncles, two brothers and his father. He sings like a man being interviewed, with "uhs" and starts and stops mixed in with the discussion of his brothers dying on the same day, a week after his father had died and a few weeks before one of his uncles died. They all died within a year – Burnside sounds guilty when he explains his thankfulness at just "making it out."

There are three hidden tracks on the album, inexplicably unnamed in the liner notes. One is pure blues, one is pure light-heartedness, one is somewhere in between – perhaps the lack of titles for these songs is the worst part of this album, but it's easy enough to know their numbers.

Burnside's soul is pain, and he offers listeners a candid explanation of that existence. Wish I Was In Heaven Sitting Down is blender of pain and brilliance. Not too bad for a 74-year-old.

Hiatt's fusion crosses water

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

John Hiatt
Crossing Muddy Waters
Vanguard Records

"Lincoln Town," the first song off of John Hiatt's Crossing Muddy Waters, just doesn't sound right. The voice is wrong, destroying the great sound of his bluesy guitar, ruining the song. Most listeners have enough reason to turn off the CD after hearing the first 30 seconds. And then, the chorus hits and Hiatt's strange voice sounds perfect.

His voice sounds so coarse, so obese, so strained, so much like Dr. John perhaps, and then, after he's challenged the ear as best he can, so fitting. Strangely, his voice is never as out of place again on the album save for one brief visit on a later track. Instead, he moves swiftly from abrasion to absolute quiet on the album, abandoning his sudden bluesy bang of the first song for a mid-Atlantic folk, all the while singing songs that might be heard on NPR's Mountain Stage. His songs of sorrow include "Crossing Muddy Waters," the story of a girl leaving him ("in my tears to drown") and "What We Do Now," when he demands "gimme back my steel/ gimme back my nerve/ gimme back my youth/ for the dead man's curve."

He's an aging man and he sings freely of his evolution, weaving stories of his development, of his lessons learned and his experiences. On some of the songs, he picks it up, singing an upbeat song of selfglous epiphany on "Lift Up Every Stone." He gets downright upbeat while singing of things left on "Gone" where he laments his lost woman, comparing her to lost fifths of gin, wrecked cars and, while he dates himself, he cleverly compares her to a gone Nixon file. He resists his groove from the album's first song on "Take It Back," a stunning description of the end of a relationship. "We were shooting for the sun/ I guess the darkness finally won/ I can't take another minute of this misery/ take back what we got in, lord it's killing me," sings Hiatt in a powerfully alternating voice, half angry, half internally speculative.

But for the most part, he sings of aged pain on "Take It Down" and "Before I Go." Mississippi blues obviously heavily influences his mid-Atlantic folk, and there are times when the northern hills of that southern state seem to be his home. Hiatt's talent is regardless of what part of the country it sounds like he's emulating, be it the pain of relationships or his faithful explorations on songs including "God's Golden Eyes." About finding God through pain, through experience, he slowly describes his realization that someone greater is watching him.

His aging doesn't betray him – he hasn't allowed himself to get bitter, instead offering us himself as an example of aging and experience, telling us his stories, whether it be softly or loudly, be that musically or vocally. Hiatt's greatest strength is his diversity.

Crossing Muddy Waters is fusion folk at its absolute best, a combination of different styles whisked into 11 brilliant songs and a diversity of sound that allows Hiatt's straightforward lyrics to glint like sunbeams after a rainstorm.

Author, actor Michael Cuccione dies at 16

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

Actor Michael Cuccione, who portrayed Jason QT McKnight on MTV's boy band spoof series "2gether," died January 15th in Vancouver, British Columbia. Cuccione, who had turned 16 just eight days earlier, died when his lungs collapsed after a bout with pneumonia.

Chemotherapy treatments that the actor had endured during his two battles with Hodgkin's disease years earlier severely weakened his lungs, making it difficult for him to circulate air properly. Also, a small car accident that Cuccione was involved in during early December may have contributed to one of his lungs collapsing. While the family has not officially stated this as a cause of Cuccione's illness, the actor was admitted to the hospital just days after the accident, complaining of difficulty breathing. He developed pneumonia early during his nearly six-week stay in the hospital.

Thousands of friends and family packed into a in a suburban Vancouver church for a prayer service and funeral the following day. The huge turnout was no surprise, as Cuccione had been an active member of the Vancouver community mainly, through his efforts to raise money for cancer research. Cuccione, a two-time cancer survivor, had raised nearly half a million dollars for Children's Hospitals in the Vancouver area through his book These are Survivors which detailed his personal fight with Hodgkin's disease, and an album of songs he wrote and performed with the monies going to charity.

Cuccione's first acting credit came in 1997 when he guest starred on an episode of "Baywatch" in which he portrayed a real life cancer victim, who died at the end of the episode. Eerily, the episode was rerun on cable just days before the actor's death. It was then that Cuccione met the shows star David Hasselhoff. Hasselhoff was so impressed with Cuccione that he remained in touch with him in the years following, and helped raise money for Cuccione's Cancer Foundation. Hasselhoff and Cuccione's bandmates in 2gether, Noah Bastian, Evan Farmer, Alex Solowitz and Kevin Farley (Chris Farley's younger brother) were among the celebrities present at the funeral and prayer service. Hasselhoff spoke at the ceremony.

Cuccione's big break came last year when he was cast to play QT in the first ever MTV made for TV movie 2gether, a parody of the current boy band craze. Although it began as a parody, 2gether quickly became a real boy band. The movie was such a success it lead to two albums both of which debuted in the Billboard Top 20, and a weekly series MTV and on Much Musicin Canada, where it is one of the highest rated shows on the network.

Cuccione's portrayal of the unique QT character was one of the highlights of the series. The character, which had a habit of making out with ladies' hands (and sometimes his own) and trying to sneak into clubs to meet pretty girls was a major part of the show that will be sorely missing should the show continue. The character also was afflicted with the fictional liver disease biliary thrombosis, and had written a book called Living with My Liver. Although the illness was treated lightheartedly on the show, Cuccione enjoyed playing a character that was ill because he felt it would better enable him to spread his message and raise money hoping to find a cure for cancer.

Before Cuccione's death, six new episodes of the series were taped, some of which featured him. Cuccione will appear in four of the six upcoming episodes as he was hospitalized during the taping of the final two. Two of the episodes heavily feature Cuccione, and one of them deals with QT's liver disease and in the episode's plot, QT almost dies. The episodes are scheduled to air on MTV beginning in February, and will be airing with the blessings of the Cuccione family.

The question of what will become of the series after Cuccione's death has yet to be answered. MTV may want to renew the show if the ratings for the next six episodes are high enough. The producers of the show have not officially decided if they would continue with just four band members, or introduce a new member. Reportedly, they have ruled out casting somebody else to play to role of QT.

In lieu of flowers and cards, the family has asked that donations be made to the Michael Cuccione Foundation for Cancer research and a donation can be made online at www.makingadifference.org.

There will be an opening reception on February 2 from 5 to 7 p.m. This show is free, open to the public, and the gallery hours are Tuesday through Friday 11 am to 4:30 p.m., and 2 to 5 p.m. on Saturdays and Sundays. It is closed on Mondays. Call 545-3670 for more information this show, or general information about the gallery.

There is a wealth of art on this campus alone, but many other opportunities are but a short bus ride away. On display now, on the third floor of the Neilson Library at Smith College are artist Judith Peck's sculptures, titled Refugees. They ... e life-size sculptures of two people made from real clothing, fiberglass, resin and artifacts. As the name implies, they represent refugees, who have to carry their child and all their worldly possessions with them as they flee from their home.

So, while you have the time and opportunity, take advantage of these exhibits. Whether on campus or off campus, the art world is rich and very much alive around the area. The Umass website also has a link to a five college calendar which lists all of these, and other art events, both current and upcoming.

equally imperfect lives, and they must help each other even as they cannot see past their own faults. A strange blend of sibling camaraderie, condescension and personal destruction underlies Sammy and Terry's relationship. It's as if they need each other, but are too independent or stubborn to admit it.

However one characterizes the relationship, though, it is never untrue, and that is due mainly to some absolutely superb acting performances. Much of the film's pre-Oscar buzz has gone to Laura Linney for her frantic, desperate portrayal of the single mother (And at this point, I'll take anything to prevent Julia Roberts from winning for Erin Brockovich). That said, this movie simply does not work without Mark Ruffalo. He takes the part of Terry and makes it his own: Ruffalo defines the character through mannerisms and looks and speech pattern. He is genuine, funny and charming as the less than desirable nomad. You'd be challenged to find a better supporting performance in the past five years, let alone this year. If he is not nominated, then it's truly a travesty.

First time Longeran has created a rare gem in You Can Count on Me. He directs the film with deft subtly which more than compensates for any blunt writing. He creates a brilliant parallel between his two main characters – one afraid to settle down emotionally, the other physically – and does not feel compelled to explore it explicitly. Rather, he lets the audience observe his compelling but tragic characters and draw its own conclusions.

You Can Count on Me may not be this year's best movie, but it just might be its best story.

Cast Away drifts off aimlessly

By Ryan Benharris

CAST AWAY
Directed by Robert Zemeckis with Tom Hanks and Helen Hunt

They say a picture is worth a thousand words. Well, sometimes, an actor can be worth millions of bodies at the after. This would be the best assumption as to what the creators of the new Robert Zemeckis directed picture were thinking when the came up with Cast Away.

First things first. Tom Hanks is perfect. He has two Oscars, fifty five Golden Globes, a couple of Pulitzers, a Nobel Peace Prize and a giant load of gold stars from the principle. He is the epitome of acting greatness and can do no wrong. If he were a female I would want him to have all of my children. (Please, for the love of God pick up on sarcasm) The idea with Cast Away was to expose the public to enough of Tom Hanks until the sight of him causes nausea. By the time that happens, the film is over, and we're all supposed to be changed people. Unfortunately, that's not enough to carry a mediocre picture with potential to be somuch more.

Cast Away is the story of Chuck an overworked Federal Express employee who gets called away to work on Christmas. Something goes terribly wrong on his flight, it crashes, and he is stranded on a desert island for four years. To make an extremely long story short, Cast Away is Chuck's attempt to reinvent himself into the life he left before that fateful night when he took off, apparently forever.

The idea for the story is tremendous. The public is already infatuated with the idea of struggling for your life due to the immensely popular series "Survivor." It had all of the makings of an interesting tale of difficulty, but unfortunately the story never quite decides which way it wants to go. It could be a survivor story. It could be a search for love story. It could even be a story about a man who learns that work is not the only thing to worry about in life. Perhaps it is because though those things have all been done before that Cast Away wants to be different. Instead of being different, however, it just ends up being confusing. The plot is not difficult to understand, but its underlying message, if an even exists is vague at best. The weird ending of the film leaves the viewer even more unsure about what it is doing.

Cast Away gets off on the right foot. It is visually stimulating and Tom Hanks is there being perfect, but it doesn't seem further. If any other actor were to attempt the lead role it would probably be an awful film. It is a display of Hanks' mythimire. Hanks spends over one hour speaking to volleyball. There is a fair amount of action, but if you're looking for conversation then this film is certainly no Dude, Where's My Car.

Besides Hanks, there are almost no other characters that we even care about. Helen Hunt, who plays Chuck's fiance before the flight, has a very minor role – a role that again, if filled by anyone other than a superstar like Helen Hunt would be written off as worthless.

The film ends up being much too surreal while trying to be real. In one scene Hanks needs to search desperately through the island to find something huge to break a coconut, while in another scene, FedEx packages float to the surface, giving him conveniently useful products to prolong his life. Is it fantasy, or is it an attempt at reality? The film never really makes a choice.

If for nothing else, Cast Away is worth seeing just for Tom Hanks' performance. The man has not made a bad film in a very long time, and he does not make an exception with this one. The role earned him a very well deserved Golden Globe nomination for Best Actor, and will probably get him an Oscar nod too. The rest of the film is pointless, and ultimately a disappointing product from the collaboration that brought us Forrest Gump, one of the greatest films ever.

State and Main an unfunny, insincere bore

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

STATE AND MAIN
Directed by David Mamet
with William H. Macy, Sarah Jessica Parker

There are some bad movies that we adore – almost worship – because we can laugh at them. Turn on USA or TBS, or the WB, and you know you'll get a great bad movie, something like Ed Wood, Dave or Labyrinth. David Bowie as an evil villian who throws babies around? That's good bad movie-making.

Then there are movies that think they are funny and profound but are actually neither. There's nothing worse than sitting through this bad ambition movie, repeatedly looking at your watch, trying to figure out if you'll still be home in time to watch "Temptation Island" part so-and-so and laugh at something that doesn't take itself too seriously.

State and Main, the new film from celebrated writer-director David Mamet, tops my list for Movies I'd Walk Out On If I Wasn't Reviewing Them, which is a very short list. The worst part about State and Main is that the critics have almost invariably embraced it, calling it a return to the great screwball comedies of Preston Sturges. This is unfathomable to me. Please tell me where these critics found funny, since every scene falls so flat that I'm convinced it was really written by an ninth grader over a dinner of mac, aroni and cheese.

The film is about filmmaking – it's set in a small New England town of Vermont where a movie crew comes to shoot a period piece called "The Old Mill." The crew is made up of the god-like director (William H. Macy), the dominating producer (David Paymer), the charming but self-involved actor (Alec Baldwin), and the airhead actress (sarah Jessica Parker). It's a good cast made even better by Philip Seymour Hoffman, who plays a normal, nice fish-out-of-water screenwriter Hoffman's character has written "The Old Mill" as a serious exploration for purity and sex, and chances. But from the beginning, when Hoffman repeatedly uses the word "purity" to the point of annoyance we know that David Mamet is trying to bang our heads over with his themes, which some have pointed as his strength but here works as a big weakness.

Of course, things don't go quite as planned with the filming as the movie crew tries to take over the town. Alec Baldwin's actor has a tendency to go after younger girls, and gets involved in a scandal with one of them (Julia Stiles). And there is no Old Mill in "The Old Mill" – it burned down in 1960.

We slowly learn that like in many Mamet films, everyone here is a schemer, and there lies a conflict between the Hollywood schemers and the small-town schemers. No one, in short, has any "purity."

Although obvious for anyone who knows Hollywood or has watched a Mamet film, this is a nice concept. The film shows an overall cleverness in its ensemble structure, and little touches – like the pothole in the road, which is at first a comedy gag and then leads to a fateful accident. And the cast, particular Hoffman and Baldwin, are at the top of their game. But for a film which celebrates writing, what happened to the screenplay?

Scenes don't make sense, dialogue falls completely flat. The romance that blossoms between Hoffman and local girl (Rebecca Pidgeon, Mamet's wife) is completely weird and never feels remotely believeable. William H. Macy's character spouts off numerous lines which could be written in satiric, Hollywood-bashing fashion but just kind of sit there, boring us. The townspeople, meanwhile, are cardboard stereotypes who speak with small-town, stereotype dialogue. This isn't a real small town, it's a movie set of a small town – which works completely against the movie's idea.

But it is Mamet's direction which makes the film suffer most. Because he comes from the theater, he is known for the staginess of his movies, the exaggerated fakeness and play-like aspect of them. This worked beautifully in a wonderful, little known movie called The Spanish Prisoner, which I thought was the movie The Usual Suspects wanted to be. And it worked almost equally well in The Winslow Boy, a beautifully crafted period piece. But here everything just feels, well, fake. Characters talk in overly self-conscious rhythms, and unlike Robert Altman, who likes to sneak up on his ensemble characters and overhear them, Mamet focuses on them, having them lecture godly, nonsensical lines like they're speaking directly to the audience. Incidentally, the definitive Hollywood satire remains Altman's The Player.

It's too bad, because State and Main could have been a very good film. Its big themes – the quest for purity and simplicity, second chances – are things that concern us very much right now as America goes digital and wired and wireless, Mamet nicely points out that even small-town America isn't small-town America even more, and that films like "The Old Mill" – which is no longer "The Old Mill" – are truly fantasies now. If only this writer had written that film.

A look at fine arts events coming to the UMass area

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

There is no better time to take advantage of the many artistic venues and exhibits that the University of Massachusetts and the Valley has to offer than the beginning of the semester. While your workload is light, why not check out one of our own art galleries right here on campus? Or, if you're willing to hop a bus, you'll find art museums and galleries in all of the other five colleges, as well as Northampton, including the renowned Smith College Museum of Art. The Valley's art options meld contemporary with traditional, and international with local. It is expression just as diverse as the people and communities of the area, whether created here or imported.

At the Hampden dining hall in South West the exhibit Intertwined/Ever Collapsing will be on view free and open to the public through February 15. The artist is the abstract painter Sarah Walker, who, with her paintings, captures the psychological within the physical plane of artistic expression. The gallery is open Mondays through Thursday noon to 6, and Sunday 2 to 5 p.m. There will be a closing reception on February 15 from 5 to 7 p.m., and a gallery talk on the same day at 4 p.m. Call 545-0680 for more information.

At the Herter gallery, starting on January 30th and running until February 28, the artist James Hendricks' Expressionist Paintings will be on view. This gallery show is also free and open to the public, and will host an opening reception on February 1 from 4 to 6 p.m. Gallery hours are Monday through Friday 11 am to 4 p.m., and 1 to 4 p.m. on Saturday and Sundays. It is located in Herter hall, and you can call 545-0376 for more information.

Staring on February 1, Central Gallery will host Cornucopias, a painting, collage, and painted objects show by artist Ellen Grobman. The show runs through February 25, with an opening reception and gallery talk on the 4 from 2 to 5 p.m. The gallery is located in Wheeler house, part of the Central living area, and it is open Monday through Thursday 5 to 6 p.m., and also on Saturday from 2 to 5 p.m. For more information call 545-0680.

Right across the way from the Central gallery is the Augusta Savage gallery, located in the New Africa House. The Augusta Savage is dedicated to displaying multicultural works, from all over the world. It has a permanent collection of folk and contemporary art. The exhibits may be viewed Mondays and Tuesdays from 1 to 7 p.m. and Wednesdays to Fridays from 1 to 5 p.m. For more information call 545-5177.

The University Gallery is located in the lower level of the Fine Arts Center and houses a permanent collection of American works, as well as an ever-changing calendar of exhibitions in a wide range of media. Beginning on February 3, it will host Living Inside, by artist Christopher Wilmarth, which will run until March 18. Wilmarth placed much of his artistic focus on light and shadows, and studied their effects through his

Thirteen Days shines with historic drama

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

THIRTEEN DAYS
Directed by Roger Donaldson with Bruce Greenwood, Kevin Costner, Steven Culp

Thirteen Days of history with unthinkable consequences. One-hundred and fifty minutes of film. Almost sheer brilliance.

Director Roger Donaldson offers an ambitious, arty and absolutely gripping take on the Cuban missile crisis in the political thriller, Thirteen Days. Ambitious because of the scope and depth of the subject that he tries to cover. From the harrowing depiction of JFK and his personal assistant Kenny O'Donnell, to minor political figures involved, to the fighter pilot taking surveillance pictures of Cuba, Donaldson covers much ground without ever losing the film's good pacing and inherent tension.

Arty because Donaldson mixes actual newsreel footage from the '60s with his own film, which itself fades to gray during the more intimate moments of the Kennedy oval office.

And absolutely gripping because Donaldson mixes the intimacy of Kennedy's close circle of friends with the dizzying nature of escalating national and international pressures. This is where O'Donnell (Kevin Costner) enters the political fray. Long time friend and personal advisor to the president, O'Donnell provides a distinctly compassionate barometer for Kennedy in the face of incringing political pressures. Likewise, O'Donnell provides our emotional barometer in the film. He admires, and perhaps is a bit intimidated by, the Kennedys' intelligence and political prowess, yet he deeply trusts them in this crisis despite the possible consequences (namely his family).

The Bobby/Jack/Kenny relationship provides the film with intimacy and humor, and often breaks up the sequences of nerve-wracking political developments. It also paints America's royal duo in a quite human light, perhaps the films greatest and most revealing achievement.

Bruce Greenwood plays the idealistic president, who was a cultural icon in his own time, with an amazing vulnerability. Here the president lashes out at political mishaps and underminings, but more often he seems haunted and introspective. Greenwood wonderfully conveys the weight and gravity with which Kennedy must have labored over the Cuban situation. He does not seem at all like the leader of the Free World, but rather a concerned father and confused friend.

Steven Culp very much follows suit as Bobby Kennedy, the heir apparent to the Kennedy throne and confidante to his brother. In one particularly unnerving scene, Bobby tells Kenny, "I hate that people think I'm the smart one, that I'm the ruthless one. I'm not that smart. I'm not that ruthless." It's scenes like this one that make Thirteen Days a good film, not simply a rehashing of historical events.

Kevin Costner is fine here as the Kennedy advisor, overcoming a bad Boston accent. He is reserved and understated, almost fading to the background while giving his best performance in a long while.

Don't be intimidated by Thirteen Days' long running time. You never really notice it. The film has you interested from the very beginning and does a wonderful job of maintaining tension throughout. I could have perhaps done without all the shots of the O'Donnell family exploding and some of the more saccharine family scenes, but these critiques are minor – not enough to spoil the film. Political junkies will more than likely love Thirteen Days. Everyone else should see it. For a film which could have easily fallen into an "America is good" mold, it is well-acted, insightful and beautifully handled by Donaldson.

Sundance honoree channels rural charm

YOU CAN COUNT ON ME
Directed by Kenneth Lonergan with Laura Linney, Mark Ruffalo
Rory Culkin

There are some stories so good, so powerful, so intrinsically human that they don't need to be told, that they simply unfold independent of any artificial structures designed to elicit them. The small town depiction of two siblings' relationship in Kenneth Lonergan's You Can Count on Me, is such a story.

You Can Count on Me, which won Best Picture and Best Screenplay honors at this year's Sundance Film Festival, is not a good movie in the traditional sense of the word. Its writing seems at times unpolished. In fact, I would argue that some of the film borders on satirizing the very small town atmosphere that it tries to capture. Some of the scenes seem unfinished.

However, if You Can Count on Me is not a good movie, then it is undoubtedly a great story: warm, touching, real and enormously engaging. The movie feels as if writer and director Lonergan visited any American small town and carved out an interesting, compelling slice for the audience's viewing pleasure.

Sammy (Laura Linney) is a single mother trying to raise her son, Rudy (Rory Culkin) in said small town. Her bank's new branch manager Brian (Matthew Broderick, almost reprising his Election character) scolds her and threatens her because of the frequent office absences needed to care for her son. When Sammy's nomadic, low-life brother Terry shows up to borrow money (again), her hopes for a family reunion (of sorts) are dashed.

Anatomy of an MTV hate crime special

RYAN BENHARRIS

MTV took the fight against hate crimes to a new level with its January 10th airing of Anatomy of a Hate Crime, which provided an in-depth look at the events leading up to the 1998 murder of University of Wyoming student Matthew Shepard. The film was the first step in MTV's yearlong series, "Fight for your Rights" – and their attempt at educating America's youth on the gravity of discrimination and its awful consequences.

With the film, MTV gains a promising chance at maturity and respect, something that it has been missing for a long time. For a station that is disgustingly flooded with ridiculously worthless programs aimed to have the same effect on teenager's minds as everlasting gob-stoppers have on their teeth, Anatomy of a Hate Crime found itself in a very unusual place. Besides the film, MTV ran eighteen hours of commercial-free descriptions of recently reported hate crimes, including assaults and murders.

The level that Anatomy of a Hate Crime and its surrounding events can be critiqued varies on so many different aspects. MTV's intent was wonderful. If nothing else, education can be a first and foremost tool towards change. However, the finished product was worse than Speed 2: Cruise Control.

Matthew Shepard's murder gained national attention as a hate crime for several reasons. Not only was it a repugnant transgression, but it actually brought protestors out of the woodwork, defending Shepard's death because he was homosexual.

Aaron McKinney and Russell Henderson of Laramie, WY were convicted of luring Shepard from a bar in an attempted robbery. They took the crime a step further when they beat him with a gun and tied him to a fence because he was gay. His body was found days later by a cyclist, who mistook him for a scarecrow. Shepard died on Monday, October 12, 1998.

The film, directed by newcomer Tim Hunter found itself concentrating far too much on the hideous lives of the criminals and not enough on Shepard himself. When it tried to give a depiction of who Shepard was, it only showed things related to the crime. We never quite learn important details of Shepard's life. He took pills for depression and thought about suicide. Those were key, but not as significant as how he acted in his every day life. Unfortunately, writers chose to present the "juicy" parts of his life and to focus on his homosexuality. To the filmmakers, Shepard being gay was not just a part of his life; it was the only part of his life that really mattered.

On the other hand, we learn an extensive amount about the lives of Henderson and McKinney. From the beginning of the film, they are depicted as singular and one-dimensional evil villains. Though their crime was heinous, the film chose to present everything that they did in their everyday life as a foresight to the day that they wouldn eventually kill. We learned everything about these men: their girlfriends, their childhood, their drug habits, and for what? Is the was to begin a condemnation of hate crimes, to take two degenerates and use them as the only examples of that type of person that commits such an awful act? Of course not.

From the Cruella DeVille ("If they don't scare you, no evil thing will") music when they enter a room, to the acute attention paid to their grubby look, these men appeared surreal. To take a true event and make the characters appear phony is not only a difficult mistake to craft, but an inane one as well. "What kind of man beats on a woman?" questions Henderson. The line is ambiguously used to foreshadow the beating he later administers. When you think about it, it is an attempt at creativity ultimately degrading toward gay men.

The film would have been much better just playing these individuals off as worthless reprobates with no purpose in life, rather than giving us an explanation of their baseness.

Do the writers want the viewers to feel bad for the criminals for having difficult lives? Well, if that is what they are going for, then it's about as ridiculous as the criminals' defense case, where they tried to make McKinney a victim of Shepard's "flamboyant homosexuality." I hope this is not what they were getting at, because if it is, then that's just disgusting.

The actual crime is by far the most lavish part of the film. They paid careful attention to making it real. Making it very real also made it scary, and this frightening reality was the most genuine material Anatomy of a Hate Crime had to offer.

The basic building blocks of filmmaking are no better than the worst of made-for-TV movies. The pitiful characters are inferior to the terrible dialogue. Anatomy of a Hate Crime fails in all aspects of everything a film is supposed to do. But does it educate?

To carp upon the quality of this film without discussing its purpose would be unfair and insensitive. The intent of the production is to deliver awareness of the awful things that surround such terrible instances. After the exhibition of film, friends of Matthew Shepard and members of Gay, Lesbian, and Straight Education Network (GLSEN) discussed not only the importance of the movie, but also the effects of the crime. It was a much more personal way to present the material than the campy film.

The eighteen hours of hate crime accounts were very interesting. Especially coming from a network that thrives so much on commercialism and money, the sacrifice by MTV means a lot.

Matthew Shepard's story is very unfortunate. It is something that we all wish there never needed to be a film about. Instead of educating people through that, it would have been much more valuable to create a documentary, and not to patronize it through film. MTV actually made a documentary like this after his murder, and again for the one-year anniversary.

For more information about MTV's "Fight For Your Right" program, check out their web page at MTV.com. For more information on hate crimes in general, call the National Center for Victims of Crime at 1-800-FYI-CALL.

TAKING FLIGHT

Mack and company topple three of Atlantic 10's best

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Don't start writing this team's obituary just yet.

Admittedly, watching the Massachusetts men's basketball team drop six straight games heading into break was nothing short of excruciating. Whether an unthinkable 13-point drubbing by Holy Cross or a three-point heartbreaker at Ohio State, the team seemed cursed on practically every outing. The last of those defeats, an 82-67 whipping at the hands of archrival Connecticut, prompted legions of former UMass supporters to call for Head Coach James "Bruiser" Flint's head.

The executioner's axe may have been stayed, at least temporarily, by the team's rather inspired play since. UMass has gone a seemingly mediocre 5-4 since the UConn loss, but has beaten three of the top five teams in the Atlantic 10 in the process. Through the gauntlet, the Minutemen have earned a sub par 6-10 overall record but a solid 4-1 conference mark that has them within one-ball game of the top spot the A-10.

The six-game skid ended with a convincing 68-52 win over cross-state rival Boston University, after which the team trekked down to North Carolina and flashed some brilliant basketball in losses to UNC (91-60) and future A-10 foe Richmond (63-59).

It was then on to the conference portion of their schedule, and that's when the fun really began for the Maroon and White. Flint's troops gut the A-10 ball rolling with a 76-60 massacre of George Washington at home, then invaded Cincinnati to shock Xavier 75-64 in its brand new, 43-million dollar Cintas Center. It was only Xavier's third loss of the year, and snapped a six-game win streak for the Musketeers.

It took a minor miracle from St. Bonaventure up in frigid Olean, NY to cool off red-hot UMass, as Bonnie Vidal Massiah hit a 3-pointer with 3.2 seconds left to steal a 66-65 win for his team. Rather than hang their heads at the improbable loss, the Minutemen channeled their energies into an electrifying 62-57 win over Dayton (the program's 1,000th victory) back home in the William D. Mullins Center. A rather rousing encore came when Bru's crew wiped the floor of the Springfield Civic Center with the Dukes of Duquesne, 80-69.

"When you get tired of getting somebody's foot… you've got to turn it around sometime," Flint said. "If we don't turn over a new leaf, that leaf's going to be in dire shape by the end of the season."

The team has also begun showing signs of an identity crafted from its brutal early-season schedule, as many players off to sluggish starts seem to have hit their strides with perfect timing for a run at the conference crown.

Leading the way is senior tri-captain Monty Mack, the preseason pick for A-10 Player of the Year. After serving a season-opening suspension and struggling to find his rhythm, the All-American has caught fire from the field and upped his scoring output to 18.2 points per game, good for sixth in the conference. Mack dropped 20 or more points in five straight games beginning against UNC, including a season-high 28 in UMass' victory over the Colonials.

Another player who has revamped his game is senior center Kitwana Rhymer, who was plagued by foul trouble that limited his floor minutes through many of the early games this season. Rhymer has cleaned up his D and blossomed into the paint power so desperately needed by UMass, posting double-doubles against Boston College (14 pts, 11 reb), GW (11 pts, 16 reb) and Dayton (19 pts, 13 reb).

Other members of the Maroon and White have come through with clutch performances at the best possible times. Tri-captain Winston Smith, known more for his stranglehold defense and endless hustle, turned into a rebounding machine against Xavier (11 boards) and Richmond (a career-high 14 carom's). Junior swingman Ronell Blizzard emerged as a one-man rejection committee, blocking a career-high seven shots at BU and four more at Xavier.

The Dec. 14 win over the Terriers (7-8) saw the Minutemen take advantage of a marked size advantage over BU. With 6-foot-8 Ryan Butt the only semblance of a center in the Terrier middle, Rhymer put up a team-high 10 points and Blizzard added career-highs of nine points and 14 boards.

The game started slowly for both teams, as neither team reached the double-digit mark until a jumper by UMass guard Shannon Crooks at the 9:17 mark staked the Maroon and White to a 10-8 lead. That edge would balloon to 30-19 at the half, despite the struggling backcourt shooting of UMass (Mack, Crooks and Jonathan DePina shot a combined 6-of-25 from the field). The Terriers simply had no answer for the Minutemen's size, as 6-foot-8 Eric Williams helped put the game away with 7-of-10 shooting from the charity stripe.

The then-undefeated Eagles of BC swooped into the Mullins Center three days later for the sixth-annual Commonwealth Classic. BC was trying to shake a five-year goose egg in the event, as UMass had claimed every one of the previous Classic showdowns with its cross-state foe. But the Eagles (12-2) used a late 11-0 run to finish off the Minutemen, who had pulled within one (56-55) with 5:35 remaining.

The decisive run was due in large part to BC's Xavier Singletary, who canned a pair of late threes on his way to a game-high 22 points. The Eagles had ridden off-guard Troy Bell (19 pts) for much of the game, until Flint switched up his defensive scheme and assigned Smith to guard the wiry sophomore. Bell managed only four second-half points after

Men's gym ends 45-year PSU hex

By Adam White

In the first meet of a new year, all a team can really hope for is for its members to come out and give their best effort.

Then again, beating the defending national champs for the first time in nearly five decades of competition isn't such a bad goal either.

That is precisely what the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team did on January 14, when the Nittany Lions of Penn State invaded Boyden Gymnasium. The Minutemen and the top cats of collegiate gymnastics packing with a stunning 205.000-202.150 victory.

UMass	205.000
Penn St.	202.150

Senior captain Andy Liese led the charge for the Maroon and White, with a fantastic performance that earned him WHMP-UMass Athlete of the Week honors. The Connecticut native said that the win itself was as much of a reward as he could possibly ask for.

"I've been doing this since I was nine," Liese said. "But this is one of the most exciting and amazing moments of my career."

The Minutemen got a solid performance out of one of their youngest members in the early goings against the 'Lions. Freshman Patrick McFarlin, a Longmeadow original, turned in a solid floor routine that earned him an 8.700 score and second place.

Penn State flashed some floor skill of its own, leaving the two teams virtually deadlocked.

"After the floor exercise, it was still a very close meet," said UMass head coach Roy Johnson.

All that changed during the pommel horse event, when the Minutemen took the first five places behind sophomore Justin Hammar's winning routine. The St. Paul, MN native hit a remarkable 9.25, followed closely by classmate Brian Peterson and his 9.10 score. Leis nailed down third place with a score of 9.00.

"In gymnastics, four out of your six people have to hit in order for you to get a good score," Johnson said. "Brian and Andy had great performances, Justin Hammar went 9.25 and we ended up winning the event.

"At that point, we were five points up. Penn State was really struggling."

Bryan McNulty was another Minuteman who was in the zone against PSU, as the Virginia native took second on the vault with a score of 9.00.

Leis went on to stick it to the 'Lions twice more, with second-place routines on the parallel bars (8.55) and the horizontal bar (8.65). The latter ended up being the decisive routine for the Maroon and White.

"After Andy ended the horizontal bar event with an 8.65, we had won the meet," Johnson said. "We had never beaten Penn State in our 45-year history, so it felt pretty good."

Penn State was paced by Jose Palacios, who placed first in the all-around with a 50.40 and won the parallel bars with a score of 8.85. Second place in the all-around also belonged to PSU, thanks to Tobias Ekman's 49.850 routine.

The team has had its chances to upset the Nittany Lions in the past, according to Liese. The senior captain said that his team had a great feeling throughout the meet that the outcome this time was going to be different.

"They've come in a bunch of times, and we've been close a few times," Liese said. "But as this meet progressed we knew we could do it."

Rivalries renewed for UMass

By David Rose
Collegian Staff

The last month of action for the Massachusetts women's basketball team has been like a wild, never-ending roller coaster ride. Along with the ups came the downs that have left the Minutewomen in the middle of the pack in the race for the Atlantic 10 title.

As of Jan. 20, the Minutewomen stand at 8-9 overall and 3-3 in the A-10 Conference.

Head coach Joanie O'Brien has seen her team, at times, show that it could be one of the most dangerous teams in the Atlantic 10. However, at some points, this team has also shown the frustrations that come with a young team that includes 9 freshmen and sophomores.

However, the coach sees a light at the end of the tunnel.

"We got two of our tougher road trips of the year out of the way," O'Brien said. "Going up to Olean is semi-torture."

The year 2000 ended for the Minutewomen at The St. Peter's Holiday Classic. That tournament saw the Minutewomen go 1-1 and show the kind of effort that they need to contend in the Atlantic 10. Although they lost their first game, a 74-62 setback to 13-2 Alabama, the Minutewomen's effort was at a peak. Sophomore Jennifer Butler scored 18 points and fellow sophomore Amber Sneed scored 15.

The Minutewomen dominated in the frontcourt, outrebounding the Crimson Tide 53-33 including Butler's 18 and sophomore Siiri Livandi's 12.

However, they saw those rebounding efforts agonizingly go to waste as they only shot 34.9% from the field and turned the ball over 25 times.

While the Minutewomen were having trouble finding the basket up close, Alabama was finding no such problems from the outside, connecting on 10-for-19 from three-point range including Manisha Redus's 4-for-4 performance form the Deep Blue Seas.

"We didn't play badly, especially early on," O'Brien said. "We got everything that we wanted, but once again we got into a situation were we didn't finish our plays. We did a good job of executing early on and got the shots we wanted, and when you don't make the shots that you worked for and what you want, you're gonna struggle a little bit and that is what happened to us.

"I think we were upset after the game that we felt that we let one slip away."

UMass learned from its opportunity missed against Alabama, and after a day off due to the snow in the Northeast, took out its frustration in blizzard-like form against Fairleigh Dickinson 69-47.

It was the Paige Harris show as the freshman from Rochester, Michigan scored a career-high 19 points, including five three-pointers. Her performance gave teams in the Atlantic 10 more to think about.

"I think the thing about Paige that is nice is that she has more to her game than just shooting," O'Brien commented. "If you run at her she has the ability to give you an up-fake, give a couple dribbles and pull up for a jumper, and that as a shooter is what you need to be great."

The Minutewomen, after a sluggish first half leading just 29-19 at the break, broke out with 40 second-half points while using primarily their match-up zone defense to hold FDU to 26 percent shooting for the game and kept them drowning in the same seas that Alabama prospered in as the Knights shot just 3-of-17 from downtown.

"We didn't allow them to do anything that they wanted to do," O'Brien exclaimed. "We did a good job in the post and they tried to bump us around a little bit an we held our own and we didn't give them any penetration, so it was definitely a team effort."

Senior Kathy Coyner chipped in 11 points and eight assists as the Minutewomen moved into conference play with a 5-6 mark.

As the New Year dawned on the Minutewomen, A-10 play began. The Minutewomen were about to run into the most important stretch of the season as the rest of their schedule is against conference competition. They got an early test against probably their biggest rival, the Hawks of St. Joseph's, on January 4.

While evenly contested throughout the entire 40 minutes the game, won by the Hawks 66-54, came down to two simple factors: the Minutewomen's inability to hit the open shots, and Angela Zampella.

The senior point guard dominated play with 23 points, 10 rebounds and eight assists. She, along with Irina Krasnoshiok keyed an 18-4 run in a span of eight minutes that pushed the lead to 33-19 with 15 minutes left.

Then as the Minutewomen were attempting a second-half rally, Zampella also hit 9-of-10 free throws, including hitting 5-of-6 in the last two minutes of the game to salt away any hopes of a UMass comeback.

"She was their big key," O'Brien observed. "I think that if that kid had any sense that she should have come to school here because every time she plays in the Mullins Center she is absolutely unbeliev-

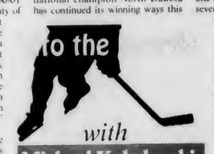
Stretch run spells do or die for hockey nation

Surprises as Badgers bumbling, St. Cloud soaring



With only five weeks remaining in college hockey's regular season, teams around the nation are busy jostling for position within their respective leagues.

Although there has been a certain amount of parity during the 2000-01 campaign, there have been plenty of surprises to talk about. Out west, the rise of St. Cloud State and the struggles of pre-season No. 1 Wisconsin have been hot topics. Closer to home, the lack of a front-runner in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference and the tumultuous campaign that Maine is enduring remain on the tips of the critics' tongues.

However, there is no dispute as to what the biggest story has been throughout the first four months of the season: the emergence of Ron Mason's Michigan State squad. At press time, MSU had posted a 19-0-3 mark in its last 22 games. They haven't lost since a 2-1 setback to Nebraska-Omaha back on November 20.

Needless to say, Michigan State has clearly established itself as the early favorite for the NCAA title. The Spartans boast a pair of Hobey Baker Award candidates in goaltender Ryan Miller and senior sniper Rustyn Dolyny. The Central Collegiate Hockey Association leaders also have a talented defensive unit that only allows 1.2 goals per contest.

"We've proven why we have 'staying power' as the No. 1 team," said Mason in an interview with US College Hockey Online. "We may not have a Mike York or Shawn Horcoff, but we have a team that works together and our strength is in the net."

And just like Mason alluded to, the Spartans know exactly where their bread is buttered. Miller is 19-1-4 on the season and recently moved past Marty Turco to set a new modern-day record for career shutouts with 15.

However, Miller's backup isn't too shabby, either. Senior Joe Blackburn is a returning All-American between the pipes, but Miller's outstanding play has relegated him to a spectator's role for the majority of the season. Ironically, Blackburn shut out Yale back on Jan. 5 in his only start of the year.

Keeping things out west, reigning national champion North Dakota has continued its winning ways this season, and currently holds the No. 3 spot in the nation. However, St. Cloud State (17-4-1) and Western Michigan (16-4-3) are two clubs that are exceeding expectations.

It was only two years ago that WMU endured an internal investigation and ended up the season as the doormats of the CCHA. However, with a new attitude that has been instilled by former Broncos standout Jim Culhane, Western Michigan is looking to climb its way up the national ladder.

"When I took over, we didn't have a timeline or a blueprint of when we could be back on the national scene," told Culhane to USCHO. "You're just looking at trying to build your program. Obviously we're very pleased about our start, but there's still half a schedule left. We're trying to, as a program, get better. That happens in practice."

Meanwhile, St. Cloud has built off last year's NCAA tournament appearance and is battling with North Dakota for the WCHA lead. The final five weeks of the season should go a long way in determining whether or not the Huskies are for real. They hit the road for a pair of weekend series at Alaska-Anchorage and at Wisconsin, as well as one road game at Minnesota.

Two of the more competitive races in the country are developing right in New England. In Hockey East, Boston College and New Hampshire have managed to stay one-two for most of the year, but the seven other teams in the league were separated by a mere five points at press time.

Over in the ECAC, parity is also the norm. Harvard and Cornell have established some sense of superiority, much like BC and UNH, but the league is a toss-up from there. The difference between third place and ninth place was only two points, while the bottom three teams were only one point apart.

The regular season champion in both Hockey East and the ECAC are awarded an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

The competitive fire burns even in the smaller Division I leagues, such as the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference. Two-time defending regular season champion Quinnipiac finds itself stationed in third place, while a pair of upstart programs - Mercyhurst and Iona - reside in first and second, respectively. The first-place Lakers also made a case for themselves as the league's best team when they spanked QU 6-0 on the Braves' home ice in mid-January.

One of the reasons why the race is so tight is likely the automatic bid to the NCAA tournament that awaits the MAAC tournament winner. Even though the regular season champ is not assured of a berth in the final field of 12, it still can help its cause by taking the title.

"This year, there's pressure on everyone because of the automatic bid," Quinnipiac coach Rand Pecknold said. "One of the things that we did in the past two years, was that, for the most part, we showed up to play every game. We didn't take too many off nights, which we've already done a few times this year. You can't just show up to play and expect to win."

"Mass Attack" reloads

Six of Bay State's best ink with UMass

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

One big reason that Don "Toot" Cahoon was chosen to pilot the Massachusetts hockey program is his heritage. Born in Lynn and raised in Marblehead, Cahoon went on to play left wing for two Boston University national championship teams and later signed a contract with the New England Whalers of the World Hockey Association.

In other words, the Bay State is as big a part of Cahoon as hockey itself.

That fact was made even clearer last month, when the coach announced that six of the Commonwealth's most promising recruits had signed letters of intent with UMass. The team still expects to land a number of other players in the spring signing period but for now, Cahoon is thrilled to be attracting the state's best to what he calls the "flagship program" of Massachusetts.

"Our slogan has been 'The Mass Attack' and we're going to back that up," Cahoon said. "The players in this state are as good as any players in the world."

The biggest of the six is Matt Walsh, a 6-foot-1, 185-pound forward who hails from Arlington and is attending Northfield Mount Hermon. His brute size and physical playing style should meld well with the team's penalty-killing unit.

"[Walsh] does everything pretty well," Cahoon said. "He's a good solid player with a good physical presence; he's going to be a nice complimentary player."

One prospect who will certainly bring the wood for UMass is Peter Trovato, a 6-foot, 200-pound forward who is finishing up at the Deerfield Academy. His father is a track coach, and the passion for fitness apparently runs in the family. Peter possesses tremendous overall strength and is in great physical condition.

Cahoon sees Trovato as a future powerhouse when it comes to physical play.

"He is a consummate checking forward," the coach said of the North Attleboro native. "He's strong on the forecheck and strong on the defensive side as well. He will be really good in the grind; he'll win all the battles."

Great things are also expected from Greg Mauldin, a 5-foot-10, 175-pound forward from Hollinston who has been tearing it up for the Junior Bruins of the EJHL. Speed and quickness are the greatest weapons of this future star, who plays well in all three zones and doesn't mind sacrificing his body to set up his teammates. His ability to stay involved in the action also drew praise from Cahoon.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Coach Don "Toot" Cahoon is making sure Maroon and White hockey lives up to its "Mass Attack" moniker. The Lynn native recently announced that six Bay State natives have signed letters of intent with UMass.

"Out of all the players we watched, [Mauldin] was the one getting the most puck touches," Cahoon said. "He has real good skating skills and real competitive instincts."

Rounding out the group's forwards is Craig McDonald, a 5-foot-11, 190-pound Canton native who is currently enrolled at Noble & Greenough. MacDonald makes his money in the corners, with tremendous passing skills and a fantastic vision of the ice.

"[McDonald] is the type of player that you would use in power play situations," Cahoon said. "He's someone that will get people the puck on a very consistent basis."

On the other side of the puck, UMass can expect a big lift from defenseman Jeff Lang. The 5-foot-11, 175-pound Westwood original and Tabor Academy product makes up for his relative lack of size with tremendous mobility and skating skills that should add speed and poise to the UMass defense.

"I would call [Lang] neither offensive nor defensive; he's somewhere in between," Cahoon said. "He's a transition type player, who can jump into the offense."

The last of the highly touted half-dozen is Tim Warner, a 5-foot-11, 180-pound goaltender whose brother Mike is a first-year forward for the Minutemen. The Waltham native was named MVP of the prestigious New England Prep School Tournament after helping Avon Old Farms capture the title last season.

"I really like the way [Warner] skates the position," Cahoon said. "I expect very much that he'll challenge Mike [Johnson] for time in net next year."

Cahoon sees his prized batch of recruits as integral to elevating UMass to the pinnacle of the collegiate hockey world.

"Once we get the little pieces in place, this can be as good a college hockey program as there is," Cahoon said. "It's not inconceivable that we can compete for a national championship here."

Heading into the winter break the Massachusetts hockey team was itself in the midst of its most pivotal stretch of the season. It was a time for the Minutemen, who had been struggling through a midseason swoon, to reach inside themselves and find a way to win games.

The eight games ahead saw the Maroon and White emerge into the heart of the Hockey East (HEA) schedule with a single contest against Eastern Collegiate Athletic Association (ECAC) opponent Brown.

UMass had fared well within the conference heading into the break posting a respectable 4-4-0 record, but in non-league play it had struggled going 0-7-2 with the ties both coming at the Mullins Center against Colgate (4-4) and Connecticut (2-2).

Maine 3, UMass 2

A place that the Minutemen have never won a game – Alfond Arena. Not only that, the Maroon and White had never mustered a point in Orono. The game was an important early-season HEA contests because at faceoff both teams were tied for fifth place and a win would catapult the winner in third in the conference.

At game's end UMass would leave knowing that its best chance to earn a point against the Black Bears on the road had escaped. And in a game that saw neither team able to take control, Maine's Eric Turgeon picked a perfect time to net his first collegiate goal. The defenseman, on a two-on-one break with Mike Mantenuto, snapped a wrist shot past Markus Helanen just over five minutes into the third period to give the hosts the victory.

The Black Bears scored the contest's first goal early in the first period when Robert Liscak netted a power play goal at the 2:08 mark on the rebound of a Martin Kariya shot.

But the Minutemen responded on the power play less than two minutes later when sniper Martin Miljko scored his eighth goal of the season when his backhand attempt was stopped by goalie Matt Yeats, but the puck caromed off Doug Janik's skate into the back of the net.

Maine regained the lead moments later when Matthias Trattnig notched his team-leading eighth goal of the season at 8:31.

UMass would not go away though, as Mike Warner scored his third goal of the year late in the first. The freshman collected a rebound of a Justin Shaw slap shot and scored on a wraparound to knot the game at two.

The game would remain that way until Turgeon's game-winner. The loss dropped the Minutemen to 0-15-0 all time at Alfond Arena.

UMass 4, Brown 1

Originally scheduled as the last game of 2000, the contest with the Bears turned into the first tilt of 2001 because of a weekend snowstorm. The Minutemen dominated the Ocean State school from start to finish and defeated Brown, 4-1.

The game was the first in almost three weeks for UMass, who hadn't played since losing to Maine back in mid-December. However, the Minutemen made the most out of their final non-conference game of the year. UMass had been winless against non-conference foes (0-7-2) up to that point.

"We had a pretty good effort considering the layoff," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We needed to play in a game situation [before heading back in conference play] to get the experience again of the power play, the penalty kill, and of getting bumped a little bit."

Tim Turner and Martin Miljko each scored twice for the winners. Ironically, each player reached the 10-goal plateau on the night, a feat that the Minutemen failed to accomplish last year until the final game of the season.

Goaltender Markus Helanen was only 2:16 away from his third shutout of the year, but a late Brown goal from Matt Kohansky spoiled the bid. All in all, Helanen made 17 saves on the night.

"Sometimes those are the tougher games to play [when a goaltender doesn't see a lot of shots], but Markus made all of the saves that he was supposed to make," Cahoon said. "He stopped a couple of breakaways, and also made a couple of saves in tight. You can't rate his performance as anything but pretty good."

Turner and Miljko each scored in the opening period to hand the Maroon and White a 2-0 lead after the first intermission. Miljko tacked on his second of the night in the middle frame, while Turner closed out the scoring for the home team in the third period.

Providence 4, UMass 0

It was a game against a team that the Maroon and White had dominated over the past two seasons. UMass had posted five consecutive wins over Providence with its last loss coming in February of 1999. On Dec. 8 UMass posted an impressive 5-1 win over in Providence.

But on this night the string would come to an end. The No. 11 Friars blanked the Minutemen at Schneider Arena.

The Maroon and White dominated the first half of the first period as it peppered goaltender Nolan Schaefer with shots but were unable to capitalize. Nearly 10 minutes into the game the Friars posted their shot on Helanen. From that point on it was all PC.

Drew Omicioli scored the game's first goal when he skated in front of the UMass net and re-directed a Peter Fregoe pass past Helanen at 14:15 mark. His first of two goals on the night would prove to be the game-winner as Schaefer turned aside all 25 UMass shots en route to the victory.

The Friars would double their lead later in the period when Michael Lucci scored on the power play with Tim Turner in the penalty box for hooking.

In a penalty-filled second period Peter Fregoe would add another goal to push the PC lead to 3-0 when he finished on a picturesque two-on-one with Omicioli. The two forwards passed the puck back-and-forth from blue line-to-blue line with the end result being Fregoe's fifth tally of the season.

The scoring would be finished when Omicioli scored on another oddman rush as the result of a Minuteman turnover at 19:13 of the middle stanza.

Providence 8, UMass 5

One of the most frustrating losses of the season for the Minutemen came in this defeat at the hands of Providence. A night after losing the front end of a weekend set in Rhode Island's capital, UMass bolted out to a 4-0 first period lead over the Friars.

However, just like they did in an overtime victory against Lowell earlier in the season, the Minutemen failed to hold the lead. Providence scored five goals in a span of 6:52 to take a 5-4 lead midway through the second period.

Tim Turner cut the PC lead to only a goal in the opening minute of the third period, but the Friars added two more markers to seal the win.

"You can't give up two short handed goals, two four-on-four goals and two power-play goals and expect to win," Cahoon said. "One thing that we think that we have with this club is goaltending, and it kind of disappeared on us this weekend."

Single goals from Tim Turner and Scott Horvath were sandwiched around a pair from Kris Wallis in the first period, and UMass appeared to be on its way to an easy win. However, a short-handed score from Marc Suderman late in the opening

Underwater Hockey

You like swimming? You like hockey? You like hairy men? Well, you're gonna love this! Imagine playing hockey while you swim. If you joined an underwater hockey league, your hairy chest would have the everlasting privilege.

The underwater hockey season officially kicked off last November with the sixth annual, "Hard on Your Body" tournament in Charleston, SC. The tournament was an abundant success.

Team Miami took home the gold after barely squeaking by team Old Farts in the final round by a score of 3-2. Old Farts hung in there until the end, but apparently only had enough oxygen to produce little bubbles in the pool, while Miami burst through and ripped the big one.

According to the University of Illinois, "Underwater hockey is a fast moving game that quickly builds swimming and free diving capability." The game also "inhibits the use of brute force," and is played solely on the bottom of the pool.

One thing you can be assured of, while strapping on your arm floaties is that there will be absolutely no Marty McSorleys in the pool. If you even think about going postal, you'll get "thrown in the bin." Though it sounds like a place to find crappy returned clothes at Walmart, the bin is actually underwater's equivalent of a penalty box.

Equipment used in competition includes, mask, snorkel, fins, one glove, ear protectors, mouth guard and a 12-inch wooden stick shaped like the machete that O.J. used to...ah, never mind.

The closest place to find an Underwater Hockey challenge is at the YMCA in Milford, CT. So amidst, "Having a good meal" and "Doing whatever you feel," you can strap on the goggles and train to be like the men in the featured pictures.

It is a toss-up as to what the most important rule and explanation of the game actually is. The co-"Third and 48" editors can't decide between. "Swimsuits are optional but recommended," and "Air can be found at the top of the pool." You be the judge.

In all seriousness, underwater hockey has become quite popular in the United States. "You play for the love of the game," said Pat Carboneau, an H2O hockey player since 1983. Starting in college is a good idea. Carboneau indicated, "Most people peak in their thirties."

In 1994, Carboneau went with the US national team to the World Championships of underwater hockey and took third place, the best US finish ever.

Anne Paine, also a long time player of the sport, finds it exhilarating. "It's a freedom of a different sense because you're not restricted to gravity," she said. "It's something that no other sport can offer."

Elephant Polo

While you were home being lazy as Hell, the hard-working Elephant Polo players of Nepal were hard at work. From December 10th to the 16th, the 19th annual World Elephant Polo tournament caused a stir of excitement. The following is the chronological order of how each elephant placed from first to last; Tiger Tops Tuskers, Swissair, Chivas Regal, National Parks, British Gurkha Gladiators, The Tigress, El Dorado, Screwy Tuskers, Harry Winston Rough Cuts and Cresta Poonanhis.

The tournament will not be broadcast on television, but we're assuming that if it were, it would have higher ratings than the Super Bowl and "Survivor" combined. Nothing brings in the crowd like watching grown men ride elephants.

Oh, and the rumor that the Tigress and Screwy Tuskers spent time after the match engaging in drunken sex could not be confirmed.

Unicycling

We have no premise for printing this. And we really have no clue how we stumbled across it. But here it is: an email conversation between uni-cyclists Daniel Dick and John Larkin as found on unicycling.org. We thought that you might enjoy it.

Daniel Dick: "A few years ago, ok several years ago, when I was a university kid, a friend of mine and I used to get together with our unicycles. For me, it was a little awkward at first for me to get off my regular sized unicycle and ride his giraffe, but I seemed to be able to ride it ok. However, when I climbed off his giraffe and tried to get back onto my "normal" unicycle that I'd been riding for years, it took me several minutes before I could ride it again. It was like going back to when I was 10 years old.

"How do you psych yourselves into making these changes back and forth easily, or does it just become natural with time like learning to ride a unicycle in the first place."

John Larkin: "I just rode my first 6-foot giraffe about 2 days ago. It was fun being that far off the ground and still in control (sort of). I know exactly what you mean by feeling funny on a normal uni again. The giraffe has a 20-inch wheel, and my uni is a 24-inch. It took me a minute or two just to get used to being close to the ground again. I've been riding the giraffe more and more, and it seems to get easier to make the transition from one uni to another. I guess it's just something you have to get used to."

We'd hate to burst your bubble, but we think that a "giraffe" is a type of unicycle. Regardless, this gives new meaning to the old saying, "It's like riding a bike." Oh yeah, and "Get a life," too.

Stolen Knife from the Alligator Shop

HarkIA knife was stolen several months ago from the Colorado Alligator Farm gift shop located in Mosca, CO. It was custom made, by a son named Mike. It is made from an alligator jawbone, and the holes in the grip area are filled with antelope horn. If you have any information that might help someone find the knife, please send them an e-mail. Thanks.

P.S. We're not sure exactly whose son Mike is. Sorry.

Mass Milk Consumption

Boy, did we work hard to get you this story. Last semester, we heard rumors of a Providence College student's attempt to drink an entire gallon of 2-percent milk in one hour. We've heard that it can't be done. Mike, a sophomore in St. Joseph's Dorm, thought otherwise. And we finally have the facts to tell you all about it.

"Are you kidding me, one hour to drink a gallon of milk...easy money," were his first words. But with 10 minutes to go and only two glasses left on the table, the words "I can't do it, I'm going to explode," trickled out of his dairy-riddled mouth.

"Gorilla," as his dorm-mates call him, sat on the couch hoping that his stomach would settle down. But of course, it wouldn't. Gorilla would soon pull the trigger.

"Poor guy," St. Joe's resident Pat Slattery said. "We thought he could do it. But he's just a failure like everyone else who has attempted the milk challenge."

Toward the end, about 10 Friar spectators had stumbled upon the Gorilla and his daring adventure. Most were screaming and urging him on with such things as free pizza, money and cases of beer. Pretty soon, the pot was around $40, two pizzas and two cases of beer.

"He couldn't do anything, just puke" Randy Ingham, another St. Joe's resident said. "And this was from a self proclaimed milk lover too. We said that at 30 minutes left he could eat three oreos, but when the time came, he refused to eat for fear of blowing cookie chunks."

"We wouldn't have made a big deal about this thing," he continued. "But Gorilla boldly proclaimed that he would be successful."

Yet again, another one has fallen to the eternal Milk Maid.

If any UMass students want to make an attempt, we'll gladly cover your failure and make you a campus icon. (Editor's note: I could definitely do this.) Drop us an email at collegian_sports@yahoo.com if you're willing...

A real balancing act

Women's gym vaults into New Year

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Women's Gymnastics Team struggled to hold its balance as the team fell to several Mid-Western teams over winter session. Coming from a third place finish in the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship last March, UMass started the season off with two meets in Michigan after the New Year.

Western Michigan State University was the first to host the Minutewomen on January 14th in their quest to be a strong force among the A-10 Conference. The WMSU Broncos brought Illinois-Chicago and Eastern Michigan along with UMass to their territory.

The host Broncos were able to pull a first place finish in Kalamazoo with a score of 193.100. Illinois-Chicago came just behind, leaving the day in second place at 191.025. In third was the Maroon and White, back almost four points with a final score at 189.600.

Eastern Michigan came following at fourth, scoring 189.400 on the day.

Second year gymnast Katie Tefft, a native of Michigan, gave a strong performance on the balance beam. Tefft's first place finish earned a 9.85 for the Minutewomen. Also on the beam was fellow team veteran Tracey Chew, who came in seventh at 9.70. Chew also competed in the uneven bars, placing highest among the Massachusetts team. Her presentation earned a score of 9.55, putting her in twelfth place for that event.

Sophomore Jen Gendron debuted on the floor exercise with an exhibition earning her a solid score of 9.7. Gendron's tie for fourth helped advance the Minutewomen on the day.

Just a week later the Minutewomen were back in the Auto State to compete against Michigan State. The Spartans were a tough match and out scored Massachusetts 192.750 – 185.650.

Gendron was the leading force on the day as UMass' highest finisher, coming in second in the all-around at 37.575. Behind her was senior Jobi Dan'Sy with a 37.375 in third place. The loss to MSU cost UMass to drop to 1-3 overall.

After two weekends in Michigan, the Minutewomen were a little disappointed to come back to Amherst under .500. Expectations were marked high for the team as they headed west. The week that the gymnasts were able to have together did help to strengthen the team for the future season.

Head Coach Dave Kuzara told the Collegian that fans can look forward to seeing this bonding time and the opening meets as a payoff against strong A10 teams, such as West Virginia.

"We're a pretty young team. We had to pull together the first couple meets. I think you'll see that we'll have a totally different look soon," said Coach Kuzara.

Tefft, one of the top gymnasts on the Massachusetts team and in the A-10, was injured during the first meet at WMSU. Tefft suffered an ankle sprain during the floor exercise that kept her from competing at Michigan State the following weekend. Tefft is expected to be out of competition for the next few weeks. A strong competitor in all events, Tefft will be missed in her time of healing.

Her past trophies includes an alternate post for the 1996 U.S. Olympic Team.

"People will step up," said Coach Kuzara on Tefft's absence.

Another top UMass competitor, Jobi Dan'Sy, has shown great strength in the all-around as a returning senior. Kuzara describe Dan'Sy as being a strong leader to the Minutewomen gymnasts.

Coach Kuzara emphasized that right now the team has their health. As the Winter Session draws to a close and the Spring Semester goes underway, women's gymnastics is looking to turn their opening meets around.

The next month should prove the team to be one of the top teams of the A10. Boyden Gymnasium played host to the team's first home meet against Cornell on Sunday, and will host West Virginia this Saturday.

Camby loses his cool

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

On Monday Jan. 15, former University of Massachusetts men's basketball standout Marcus Camby caused one of the more bizarre moments in recent NBA memory.

After being elbowed in the face near his eye by San Antonio Spur Danny Ferry, Camby had to be restrained by officials and teammates from retaliating. Camby seemed subdued, until he saw blood coming from his eye. He then lunged after Ferry, who had his back turned on the sideline at the time, with a punch.

"He poked me in the eye, bloodied me up," Camby told teammate Larry Johnson later that night. "I wasn't going to hit him until I saw the blood in my eye."

Looking like a prizefighter after a 15-round bout, Van Gundy told the media after the game, "He got the shot in that every one of our players would like to do to me. He just got one free."

Van Gundy has not had the best of luck in such altercations. During a 1998 playoff games between the Knicks and the Miami Heat, Van Gundy tried to part a pair of battling titans – Alonzo Mourning and Johnson. He wrapped himself around Mourning's ankle and took the brunt of that fight's punishment also.

Last year, Van Gundy's 1995 Honda Civic was blown up by an airplane's afterburners before the Knicks flight to Miami for yet another playoff game versus the Heat.

Camby turned contrite on the day after the incident, especially with regard to his head coach.

"Seeing Jeff today, I just feel sorry for the guy," Camby said. "Because if you look at him you'd think he's really been in a fight."

Camby was ejected from the game. Before hitting the showers, Camby grabbed a folding chair in protest, before a security guard took it away from him.

Camby reportedly later waited around for Ferry – first outside the Spur's locker room and then outside their team bus. He eventually had to be convinced by among others, teammate Johnson, Knicks President Dave Checketts and General Manager Scott Layden, to leave the arena.

"We were banging around the whole game," Ferry said. "I don't remember doing anything to lead to something like that."

Camby was suspended by NBA commissioner David Stern for five games and was fined $25,000 for swinging at Ferry. Ferry served his one-game suspension for the elbow on Wednesday Jan. 17, when the Spurs played host to the Toronto Raptors.

Although Camby expressed remorse for his actions, he did file an appeal with the NBA Player's association. However, the legal action did not prevent Camby from serving the suspension.

"I regret that I lost my cool, because that's not me," Camby told ESPN at the Knicks practice facility. "Those who have been around me since I've been here know that I'm an easygoing type guy."

"I just lost it when I saw that blood, and I was truly, truly in the wrong."

Camby wound up with some scrapes above both of his eyes – both from Ferry's punch and from colliding with Van Gundy.

The Knicks organization responded negatively to the punishment leveled on Camby by Stern. Notorious troublemaker Latrell Sprewell, whose 1997 choke hold on then Golden State Warriors coach PJ Carlisimo caused an eruption of media attention the likes of which have not been paralleled, lashed out at Stern for the punishment.

"I just think it's unfair. Without mentioning names, guys have been in fights and connected and they haven't been fined that severely. I just thought it was a little harsh and a little unfair. Not just to Marcus but to our team," Sprewell told the Daily News. "The bottom line is that he didn't hit the guy and they didn't take into account him getting elbowed twice. They have to look at the total picture. If you're looking at the total picture, I don't think you come up with a five-game suspension."

Earlier this season, former Knick and current Toronto power forward Charles Oakley received only a three-game suspension for clocking Sacramento Kings guard Jeff McInnis.

Van Gundy echoed the sentiments expressed by his star swingman.

"The punishment doesn't fit his actions," Van Gundy told the Daily News. "I think clearly there was a lot of talk of three to five games and I think that put a figure in their minds about what would be acceptable to them. And I think people saying if he was back for the Lakers it would be a cave-in to NBC. I think that had an effect too."

Stern has recently acquired a reputation for being rather stringent in his rulings. Earlier this season, Dallas owner Mark Cuban was nailed with a $100,000 fine for simply sitting on the baseline of Reunion Arena with his trainers.

UMass men's basketball head coach, James "Bruiser" Flint, who was an assistant coach during Camby's college career, expressed some surprise over the Minutemen alum's actions.

"Marcus never got that angry up here. I know he'd never hit anybody," said Flint "He didn't have to; Tyrone [Weeks] was here. He went in and hit people for him."

However, during the 1994-95 Minutemen campaign, Camby's sophomore year, he was ejected from a game versus Rutgers for throwing a punch.

Tyrone Weeks is now an assistant coach at UMass' Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure.

Despite Camby's absence on Jan. 19, as he served the first game of his suspension, the Knicks beat the Detroit Pistons 97-91. Kurt Thomas, who took Camby's place in the starting lineup, finished with 10 points and five rebounds. On the season, Camby is averaging 10.6 points, 11.1 rebounds and 2.3 blocks a game.

With Camby in the lineup, the Knicks have amassed a 25-13 record, second best in the Eastern Conference behind only the Philadelphia 76ers, who hold the NBA's best record.

In 1998, Camby was traded from Toronto to the Knicks for Oakley and cash compensation.

frame cut the Minutemen lead to 4-1 and shifted the momentum to the side of the Friars.

Providence came out for the second period with a vengeance, jumping all over the home team and eventually pulling out the win.

"Before the game, I said to our coaches that we were either going to come out very confident tonight or very flat," Providence coach Paul Pooley said. "Obviously, it was the latter. I was disappointed because I said that this was a big game for us, and I even wrote up on the board for our players that this was the most important game of the year for us.

"What I really thought was that they were afraid to be in first place in Hockey East. I told them that after the first period, and they responded to it. To get where we want to be, we have to be able to beat quality hockey clubs. We grew a lot as a hockey team and as a program tonight."

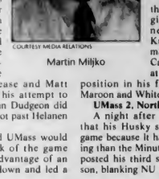
Northeastern 4, UMass 2

It was a night in which early goals did the Maroon and White in. The Huskies scored goals within the first three minutes of all three periods to sink the Minutemen.

NU got on the board first when a John Peterman slap shot from outside the blue line defected off defenseman Kelly Sickavish and beat Helanen to the stick side. The Huskies would double their lead midway through the period when Joe Mastronardi collected his own dump in the right corner and centered the puck. The puck sat in the crease and Matt Keating whiffed on his attempt to shuffle it in, but Ryan Dudgeon did not as he slipped a shot past Helanen through a crowd.



COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Martin Miljko

Late in the period UMass would catch its first break of the game when Wallis took advantage of an NU defensive breakdown and led a streaking Miljko on a clan breakaway. Miljko faked a forehand shot and got goalie Mike Gilhooly shifting right, and subsequently beat him with a backhand to the stick side to cut the lead in half.

At the 1:54 mark of the second period the Huskies would regain a two-goal lead on a Willie Levesque goal. Levesque was the beneficiary of a great individual effort by NU captain Jim Fahey as he carried the puck from blue line-to-blue line, but saw Helanen make the save. The rebound squirted to the front of the cage and Levesque banged it home.

The score would remain 3-1 until the third period when Chris Lynch scored on a wraparound to push the NU lead to 4-1.

UMass would add another goal late in the third period when Thomas Pöck scored on a vicious slap shot from the right face off circle. But the freshman's goal was too little, too late as the Minutemen dropped their third consecutive league game.

"It was a game we had to win and we found a way to win," NU coach Bruce Crowder said. "I don't think it was pretty. I though Amherst played extremely hard, but I think we got a little better goaltending than they did tonight."

The contest was the first in the collegiate career of the newly added Nick Kuiper. The freshman from Montreal, Canada played solid at the right defensive position in his first game for the Maroon and White.

UMass 2, Northeastern 0

A night after Crowder thought that his Husky squad had won a game because it had better goaltending than the Minutemen had Helanen posted his third shutout of the season, blanking NU 2-0.

The shutout was the third in HEA play for the senior with all coming in the friendly confines of the Mullins Center. The Vantaa, Finland native did not allow a goal to No. 5 New Hampshire and Merrimack earlier in the season.

After a scoreless first period UMass scored a goal late in the second period when one of the most unlikely goal scorers dented the twine. The scorer was Samuli Jalkanen – the goal his first of the season and the second of his career. The sophomore had not scored a goal since Dec. 11, 1999 when he tallied on a fluttering slapshot in a 5-3 win over Notre Dame. Assists on the goal went to Sickavish and Darcy King.

The Minutemen would end all of NU's hopes of tying the game when Crowder pulled Gilhooly in favor of the extra attacker and Wallis slipped a shot in with one-second left to ice the game. Jalkanen and Tim Turner assisted on the score with the sore being Wallis's fifth in his last three games.

Merrimack 3, UMass 0

A game that was very reminiscent of the 4-2 loss to Northeastern a week earlier. Merrimack would score the eventual game-winner only one minute into the game when freshman Marco Rosa scored his first of two goals on the night. Rosa would score is second goal of the night on the power play at the 18:03 mark of the second period. Helanen made four consecutive heroic saves to keep the Warrior from expanding their lead early in the man advantage, but only one second left on the power play Rosa slipped the rebound of a Nick Parillo shot past the senior to double the lead.

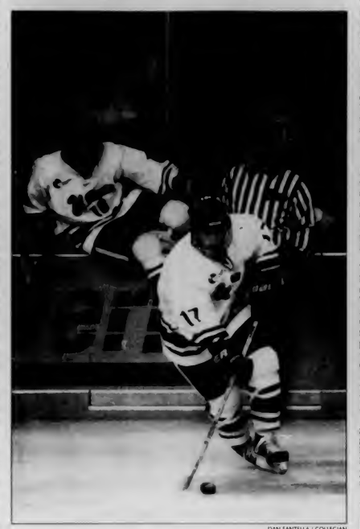
Parillo would complete his two-point night when he scored an empty net goal late in the third period to seal the victory.

On the night Helanen turned aside 22 Merrimack shots but his goaltending counterpart Tom Welby was better on this night as he stopped all 23 UMass shots en route to his first shutout of the season.

UMass 2, Merrimack 1

This game was crucial for the Minutemen. With a win UMass would take the season series with the Warriors and more importantly two point could move them into a tie with Boston University for fifth place in Hockey East.

The Maroon and White overcame a lackluster performance to hand the Warriors a crushing 2-1 loss at the Volpe Complex. Freshman forward and power play wizard Horvath scored his fifth goal of the season at the 1:37 mark of the third period to grab the win for the Minutemen.



DAN SANTELLA / COLLEGIAN

"It was a hard-fought game and a good win for us," Cahoon said. "We got some luck tonight. We haven't had our share this year. We have had 10 goals scored against us this year by hitting a piece of our equipment."

The goal came with a man advantage and was Horvath's third power play goal of the season.

UMass got on the board first when fellow freshman and Avon Old Farms player Mike Warner just 3:24 into the game.

The Minutemen would have their first "puck luck" in a long time on Warner's goal when a Randy Drohan slap shot went wide of Warrior goalie Joe Exter, but found its way to Warner's stick and the Waltham native made the best of his opportunity lifting a wrist shot past a helpless Exter.

Merrimack would tie the game early in the second period when Joel Gray fed John Pyliotis in the left slot and beat Helanen short side to tie the game at one.

Helanen allowed the Minutemen to have a chance to win the game as stopped 32 warrior shots.

"Helanen made several great saves," Cahoon said. "You get a feeling when he is in a zone. He is a tough guy to beat. He is a great competitor and you don't need to sound off to get him to play good."

Exter made 34 saves in the losing effort for Merrimack.

"I thought we played hard," Merrimack coach Chris Serino said. "We didn't play smart tonight. We know how to play but we continued to turn the puck over. We need to play consistent to win in this league. There are too many good teams."

All in all it was a successful winter break for the Maroon and White. It saw itself earn two wins in Hockey East and find itself in a great position heading down the home stretch of league play.

With a 3-5 winter break UMass finds itself at 7-15-2 on the season and with a 6-8 mark within the conference.

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS BOSTON
Teach Next Year
Graduate College of Education
Question #1: Would you love to teach in Boston?
Question #2: Do you believe you can bring your talent and emerging expertise to high school students?
Question #3: Can you see yourself in a classroom at a dynamic urban high school?
If your answer to all three questions is yes, consider becoming part of an active school-university partnership through enrollment in Teach Next Year at UMass Boston.
Teach Next Year offers:
■ a one-year route to teacher certification and a master's degree through an experimental, experiential school-based program;
■ a full year of graduate study at UMass Boston integrated with teaching at Boston's Dorchester High School;
■ the first steps along your pathway to a career as a high school teacher.
Do you qualify?
Applicants must have a bachelor's degree in one of the liberal arts or sciences, or anticipate earning one by June. Teach Next Year is designed for college graduates who have records of leadership and achievement and who seek the opportunity to begin teaching in an urban high school. Persons of all backgrounds are encouraged to apply.
Costs?
Each Teach Next Year participant receives a full-tuition grant, a waiver of most fees, and a $10,000 graduate assistantship.
Priority consideration is given to applications completed by March 15, 2001. Please call or email us for more information:

high level.

The Minutewomen are now seven games into their A-10 schedule and Butler is beginning to emerge as the team's go-to offensive player. But again, that doesn't come without youthful struggles.

"Jen doesn't feel like she's getting the calls or the respect she deserves, and it's frustrating her," O'Brien said. "I think a lot of it is her getting double-teamed and still trying to make those same moves. No one is coming to her rescue.

"She has to prove that she can score before they're going to give her those calls. Susan Moran (Saint) Joseph's leading scorer and Irish National Team standout) gets more three-point plays than anybody and it's because she has proven for years that she can score."

In her last eight games (as of Jan 20), six of which were on the road, Butler averaged a double-double (15.6 ppg, 10.1 rpg) as the Minutewomen went 3-5 in the A-10. With her finally understanding what she needs to do, you have to start looking to other areas of the Minutewomen attack. And the one player who is definitely filling her new role nicely is sophomore Ebony Pegues. Pegues, a starter earlier in the season, was been relegated to the role of UMass' sixth player.

"Of course I think I should be starting," Pegues said. "But one thing that's good about coming off the bench is that I don't have to think as much. I can just come in and play my game."

On Jan. 14, Pegues didn't do too much thinking against A-10 foe Dayton. Because she was unconscious. Pegues went seven-for-13 from the floor on her way to a career-high 17 points. In the game, Butler and senior Kathy Coyner struggled early and Pegues' burst off the bench was the main factor in the Minutewomen's 69-57 victory in Ohio.

"Ebony has been just huge off the bench for us," O'Brien said. "She is such a good scorer that she gives an immediate spark to the offense. She comes in and the game changes immediately. It's a role she's really grasped with both hands."

As of now, this is what the starting five looks like: Coyner, Butler, Siiri Liivandi, Amber Sneed and Paige Harris. Coyner and Butler are both good for 15 points a night and you can always count on them for their respective assist and rebounding contributions. Sneed, a sophomore, struggled early in the season, but she beginning to find a consistent groove on the offensive side of the ball. Transfer Liivandi has struggled a little but she has fought hard on the boards all season. And every so often, she finds some confidence on offense.

Paige Harris

"Siiri is really just a rookie," O'Brien said. "She's been up and down a bit, but that's just part of being young and having to learn a new system. She's starting to find a level of consistency, before too long she'll be a real contributor for us."

Harris, the O'Brien-dubbed "best shooter UMass could possibly ever have," rounds out the starting five. She's had her games, but the freshman is still having a hard time finding the basket every time she suits up.

"I just need to get more mentally tough," Harris said. "Basketball is 90 percent mental; you just have to believe that you can make those shots."

We know Harris can shoot the basketball. Her form is probably the best this town has ever seen. Her big problem, however, is that she's having a hard time finding shots. And when they're presented to her, she's hesitating to fire. But O'Brien seems intent on keeping her in the starting position, because it's not that Harris isn't giving 100 percent. She's still learning. And we all know, you have to play to get the true Division I education.

"Paige is starting to get in good rhythm," O'Brien said. "If I yank her now, I think it would throw us off a little bit. She's starting to give us a little more on the court; the kid's diving on the floor constantly. She's so new at the college game that shot selection is something she's still picking up."

There's less than 10 games left on the schedule. And they're all conference battles. If UMass has any chance at post-season glory, it's going to have to gain some respect in the remaining A-10 match-ups. Let's wipe the slate clean right now. Who knows what a good seed in the A-10 tourney could lead to? The Minutewomen have been hinting all year of what they can accomplish. And I know I've seen it. It's time to put it all together.

I have my fingers crossed.

Debating history's best

My colleague Adam White and I had an argument during the winter break about where Vikings wideouts Randy Moss and Cris Carter rank with the greatest receiving duos in NFL history.

Being a die-hard Minnesota fan, my colleague has Moss and Carter as the greatest of all-time. While most people will agree with Adam, I am one of those who are not ready to give them that dubious distinction.

Best case in point: the NFC Championship game between the New York Giants and, well, I can't say that they played anybody because we are not sure if the Vikings have showed up to Giants Stadium as of yet.

The so-called greatest duo all-time combined for five catches for 42 yards and Carter did not catch his first pass until the fourth quarter, after the Giants had put up 41 points already. Their performance, or lack thereof, made Amani Toomer and Ike Hillard look like the greatest duo to come to this country since the Wright Brothers came up with flying.

Moss's comments after the game about his team were dead on, but he should have included himself in those comments for being guilty for not showing up for the second time in an NFC title game (combined seven catches for 96 yards).

Though Moss has scored 43 touchdowns through three years and Carter is one of only two receivers to have at least 1,400 receptions along with Jerry Rice, they can't be given the mantle unless they show up on the biggest of stages.

They can't be up there with some of the best receiving duos ever, such as Mark Clayton and Mark Duper. The "Marks" brothers combined for 140 touchdowns in nine seasons together with Dan Marino at Miami and are number one and number two all-time in receiving yards with the Dolphins (Duper, 8,869 yards and Clayton 8,643).

In 1984, the duo combined for 2,695 yards receiving and each had a huge hand in getting the Dolphins to the Super Bowl, a place where Moss and Carter have yet to arrive.

Another receiving duo that can be up there in terms of production is John Taylor and Rice with San Francisco. Yes, I know some of you are saying, "He is a 49ers fan so he can just throw any two players from San Francisco together and he'd think they were great." No so fast; look at the production these two put up.

Rice is the greatest receiver of all time with NFL records in countless categories including touchdowns (180) and receptions (1,206) and while Taylor had only 347 receptions in 10 years, he along with Rice came up big in three Super Bowl triumphs.

Super Bowl XXIII saw Rice named the MVP and Taylor catching a 10-yard touchdown from Joe Montana with 34 seconds left to win the game. In three Super Bowls, the two combined for 36 receptions for 614 yards and nine touchdowns. Those nine touchdowns in Super Bowl play are nine more than Moss and Carter. I wonder why, maybe cause they have not been there.

There are a couple of receiving duos that you can put up with the greatest of all-time, including Charlie Joyner and Keilen Winslow of San Diego in the early 1980's and Lynn Swann and John Stallworth of the famed Steelers dynasty of the 70's. But you can't put Carter and Moss up there yet. I am not denying the fact that when it is all said and done, than Vikings will claim fame to having the greatest WR tandem ever, but until they show up in the pressure situations, the mantle will not be theirs.

* * * * *

Not so fast, Dave. I'll admit that Minnesota's twin missiles ended up being duds in this year's playoffs, but I'll contend that they're still the best ever. The reasons for this go beyond just their statistics and what they've accomplished in the NFL's second season.

First of all, let me debunk a few of your choices for history's two best targets. Duper and Clayton? I'll admit, they RULED in Tecmo Bowl. But when you're assessing just how great the Marks were, you need to consider a few other factors…

No. 1) Who was throwing all those footballs they reeled in. Marino in the prime of his career threw the ball with more velocity and better accuracy than any other QB of his day. Let's face it: you and I could have been all-pro selections with Dan the Man lining up under center.

Now just imagine if Mark and Mark were still playing, running routes for Jay "Which Team Am I Playing For Again?" Fiedler. Nuff said.

No. 2) The offense run by the 'Fins back then. Quick, name three Miami tailbacks from the eighties. Don't worry, neither can I. Papa Shula knew what he had in terms of offensive weapons, and he rode the combination of Marino's arm and his wideouts' speed for all it was worth. Now take a look at Minnesota's offensive balance, particularly when Robert Smith is healthy. In those two games (just kidding) the Vikings are about as balanced a team as you can find. So that's game, set and match to Carter and Moss in that comparison.

Now here's where it gets ugly. The Minnesota – San Francisco argument.

We may as well just choose pistols at 10 paces, because neither of us is going to back down on the team we love. So I'll try to sway you at least with a little logic.

First of all, Montana and Steve Young were pretty decent quarterbacks. If I had to choose between either of those guys or any of the five Viking signal callers who have had the pleasure of chucking to numbers 80 and 84. I'd choose Daunte Culpepper (Had you there for a second, didn't I?) Realistically, Montana was one of the game's all-time greats. I think you have to give at least a little merit to the argument that he made his receivers better than they really were.

Secondly, I'll take the ever-popular "evolving athletes" defense. Every year the players in pro sports get bigger, faster, more conditioned and just better. Culpepper is living proof of this, as are Peyton Manning and Donovan McNabb. And that's just from the QB perspective.

The corners nowadays are stronger and quicker than ever before. They benefit from more involved defensive coordination and scouting than ever before. Teams also blitz more now than ever before, putting more and more pressure on the guy throwing the ball. Montana got to stand in the pocket for days (Did I mention that his offensive line was better than Minnesota's?) and allow Rice and Taylor to get open. Moss has to take five-yard quick outs and use sheer physical ability to break plays.

My last and final argument for the eternal greatness of the Moss – Carter duo is that the Vikings' defense during their time together has been mediocre at best. Just about all of the teams you mentioned (especially Pittsburgh) had tremendous defenses. That takes a ton of pressure off of your offense, and allows your whole team to take what it can get and not force big plays.

Moss is, however the hands-down BEST EVER at doing just that.

Tourney time ahead?

It's very easy to hate the teams that find themselves in the NCAA Tournament every time a new March rolls around. Take for example, the Connecticuts, the Georgias and the Louisiana Techs of the women's basketball world – at the end of every season, they're packing their bags for Nike's Bracketville. Somehow, they've all come across this golden ticket of sorts (Hint: Start buying those Wonka Bars).

It's even easier, however, to hate the teams who shouldn't even be there. Note: Hampton lost to Connecticut, 116-45 in the first round of last year's NCAA Tourney. Yup, that's a 71-point shellacking (or kind of makes you wonder why the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference even gets an automatic bid, but that's beside the point).

ERIC SODERSTROM

For many mediocre programs, it's frustrating to see the name of a team who lost more than 30 percent of its games penciled in the first-round brackets on Selection Sunday. But that's how the system works. The seedings never represent the best 64 teams in the country. And as long as conferences such as the Eastern Sun Valley Over the Rainbow Belt Conference exist, the best 64 will never be truly represented.

This year, the Massachusetts women's basketball team's ticket to the tourney lies in Philadelphia at the Atlantic 10 Championships. It's too late to hope for an at-large bid. Topping just one powerhouse (Georgia, Rutgers or Stanford) would have helped that cause. And tough losses to San Francisco and James Madison just didn't. The Maroon and White has to win the Atlantic-10 if it wants to see a postseason. And that's not going to be so easy, as it found out on Jan. 20 in its 28-point loss to conference foe George Washington. When that championship date rolls around in early March, UMass must be better...and don't get me wrong. The potential is there.

After the Minutewomen's eight-point loss to No. 5 Georgia in the early goings of this 2000-01 campaign, I posed the following question to the skipper of the Lady Bulldogs, 2000 National Coach of the Year Andy Landers: "Is UMass a tournament team?"

"I think they have the potential to go far," Landers said. "They've got a nice basketball team. But I don't know (if they're a tournament team): it's too early to tell."

We just didn't know what to expect from the young Minutewomen. And quite honestly, we still don't. It's been a learning process for the one-senior squad. Head Coach Joanie O'Brien set the tough 2000-01 schedule with the assumption that junior forward Nekole Smith would be starting for her in the frontcourt – but Smith went down in practice before the season even started. And this forced a great deal of pressure down upon the 6-foot-3 sophomore frame of forward Jen Butler.

For the first 10 or so games, Butler was quite hesitant in her play. Her aggressiveness was there, but so was an inevitable lack of focus. Frustration can kill young post players and force them to make bad decisions on the blocks. It's something that comes with the territory and it's also the fine line between the good post players and the great ones. The competition has been good for her though; she is learning to compete at a able."

While Zampella and the Hawks hit 41 percent of their shots, the Minutewomen had the lid close in on an ever-shrinking basket as they shot just 28 percent from the field and an eye gauging 2-of-21 from three-point range. Although Butler had a career-high 20 points, including going 10-for-11 at the charity stripe, and sophomore Ebony Pegues scored 12 points in the second half, that was the only semblance of shooting that UMass could find.

Coyner went just 4-of-15 and Harris and Sneed both suffered through their toughest night of the season, going a combined 0-for-18 from the floor.

"There is no substitute for good shooting," O'Brien said. "Paige Harris couldn't ask for better shots. I think she was tight, I think she was more afraid of the game because of the way we talk about St. Joe's and she played afraid."

"You could she her short arm the shots a couple of times and same the thing with Kathy. It came down to that they made shots and we didn't, so there is only so much you can do."

With the St. Joe's game fresh in their minds, the Minutewomen had to travel up to Olean, New York to take on St. Bonaventure, a place where the Minutewomen had blown an 18-point lead last season.

The Minutewomen would make sure that there would be no letdown this year, as they led from start to finish in a 63-54 win.

The Minutewomen's constant hounding of the Bonnies, including the defensive pressure put on their two star players, Melissa Fazio (5-for-14 field goals) and Gellaine Clark (two first half points) held them 19 points under their season scoring output of 73 points per game. The Minutewomen also shut down Angela Scott. Scott, who had 25 points and 10 rebounds in last year's game up in Olean, had just seven points and two boards in this year's contest. However, it was the defense of Fazio that Coach O'Brien thought was the key to the game.

"She, other than Sue Moran (St. Joe's), is probably the best offensive player in the Atlantic 10 because she has a complete game," O'Brien exclaimed. "We didn't give her anything easy; we stayed between her and the bucket and we didn't allow her to get penetration."

"I think by having different people guarding her at different stretches of the game, it kept her off balance. She wasn't able to set one person up like she has with some of the other teams that have played just one player on her, so it was definitely a complete team effort against her."

Pegues had a career-high 14 points and has come up spades since coming off the bench.

"She has done a good job, she has slowed herself down a little bit, she is not trying to do everything," O'Brien said. "She is playing within herself and when she plays within herself she becomes a great spark for us.

"She just has to continue that, learn more about herself and continue to play within herself."

Ebony Pegues

After the victory over the Bonnies, the Minutewomen tried to protect their home turf against the Rhode Island Lady Rams. The Lady Rams won just two games the year before but URI had won seven contests going into the game at the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen almost made it eight.

As UMass jumped out to another early lead, there were some warning signs in the air of the Mullins that convinced you that this Rhode Island team was not just going to roll over and give way to a circus of Maroon and White points.

The Lady Rams were able to get into the lane and convert on easy shots. The play of guard Neda Djuric help bring URI within six at 37-31 despite the fact that Butler had 17 first-half points. Though the Minutewomen had the lead, the Rams were able to stay close the entire way. When Djuric tied the game at 41, the feeling in the Mullins Center went from one of expected victory to one of unreasonable doubt.

Then Butler reestablished herself in the post. Playing with four fouls in the overtime session, the sophomore from Brooklyn, New York played with the swagger of a polished senior, scoring points and taking a key charge. She ending up with a career-high 28 points and led the way to a 71-66 overtime win. Not only did the Minutewomen hang on for the win, Butler had won a lot of praise from her coach.

"We played three games in six days and she was phenomenal in all three of them," said O'Brien. "Sometimes you have players who have to be a presence on the floor that really helps the team and Jen has done that."

However, Butler and the Minutewomen's swagger turned into stagger during the first 10 minutes of a frustrating night at the brand new Cintas Center, home to defending Atlantic 10 champion Xavier.

The teams came into the game as complete opposites: UMass looking to slow the pace down and play a defensive struggle, while the Musketeers were looking to run and gun.

It was evident from the start of Xavier's 77-68 conquest that the pace and the control of the game belonged to the Musketeers and their star point guard, Reetta Piipari.

The sophomore out of Finland, starting at the point due to the season-ending Achilles injury to A-10 Rookie of the Year Amy Waugh, had 14 points and 10 assists. Her 10 assists kept her on par with her nation-leading average of 9.5 dishes per game. She had five of those assists during a decisive 29-7 first half run which saw seniors Nicole Levandusky and Jennifer Phillips score 22 combined first-half points. The Minutewomen were down 37-23 at halftime, a hole from which they were never fully able to climb out of.

Once one Finnish player in Piipari started to slow down, another Fin, senior Taru Tuukkanen, picked it up by scoring 19 of her game high 23 points in the second half as the Musketeers shot 58 percent from the field.

"Those two kids (Phillips and Tuukkanen) in the paint are big and strong and we tried to use our quickness against them and for the most part we did okay," O'Brien commented.

Back in her hometown of Cincinnati, Sneed scored a career-high 18 points, and Pegues added 11, continuing her strong play.

"Offensively, [Sneed] came to life," O'Brien said. "She was aggressive, got herself under control got a couple of easy buckets, hit a couple of jump shots and hopefully that was a chance for her to break out of her slump."

The Minutewomen had a quick turnaround from the Xavier game as they had a Sunday afternoon game against the Flyers of Dayton. In this game the Minutewomen were able to turn the wobble of the Xavier game back into the strut that they have shown glimpses of during the year. The 69-57 win was UMass at its best this season.

They hounded the Flyers on defense, holding them to just 34 percent shooting from the game. They took out the best players the Flyers had to offer as RaeLynn MacIntosh and Alena Martens, who scored a combine 34 points against Rhode Island in the previous game, scored a combined eight in this battle.

Although the Flyers led at the half 31-30, the Minutewomen were forcing them to take outside shots, a night which Coach O'Brien could take.

"We made them play the type of game that they didn't want to play," O'Brien stated. "They made five three-pointers in the first half and we were kind of banging our heads against the wall for allowing that to happen."

The key to the win was the Minutewomen's offensive performance in the second half. After some sloppy play in the first half, the Minutewomen put together the best 20 minutes of basketball of the season. They passed the ball crisply around the court, taking open shots and not committing a second stanza turnover until there were four minutes left and the game was salted away.

With family members and friends cheering from the stands of Blackburn Court, Pegues and Sneed once again led the way.

"We might have to pretend that we are in Ohio all the time if they are going to keep this up," O'Brien boasted.

Pegues, who is averaging 11 points per game in conference play, had a career-high 17 points and Sneed had 16 points and eight rebounds as the Minutewomen placed four players in double figures for the second straight game (Butler 14 points, Coyner 12 points).

"The first half we did not get anything executed; we would make one pass and then try to make something happen," O'Brien stated. "In the second half, we just made that extra pass, got some good things going and Amber and Ebony hit some big shots. I hope they can continue that for a little bit longer."

That little bit longer that Coach O'Brien is looking for started Saturday against George Washington in a game that brought back old memories for both teams. GW had eliminated the Minutewomen from the Atlantic 10 semifinals the year before. An already heated, bitter rivalry intensified in the late portions of the game.

In what might have been the Minutewomen's worst performance of the season, the Colonials took it to UMass from start to finish in a 74-46 thumping.

"If you can't dribble with the basketball and you are afraid to attack then you are going to get yourself into trouble," O'Brien commented after the game. "It was a very physical game, a very emotional game and we are a young team that if you're going to talk the talk, you better walk the walk and we didn't do that today."

Without Petra Dubacova, out after hitting her head in the previous game against Fordham, Kristeena Alexander of GW was talking and walking over the Minutewomen with 16 first-half points as the Colonials got out to a 15-5 lead in the first six minutes of the game and never looked back. With help from Lindsey Davidson hitting a pair of three pointers, the Colonials shot 46 percent for the game and 8-of-19 from the land of three.

While the Colonials were exquisite offensively, the Minutewomen were caught in a web of turnovers as they committed 15 leading to a 44-16 halftime deficit.

In the second half, while the Colonials continued bombing away, the Minutewomen were held to 20 points with 12 minutes left in the game.

That is when things began getting a little chippy.

Alexander was picked off by a hard screen by Butler (eight points and nine rebounds), which set up a Harris (12 points, 4-for-4 three-point field goals) basket. It cost GW a technical as head coach Joe McKeown continued to argue the call.

"He is saying that she set a nice screen over on Alexander and maybe Jen stood over her for a second, but that's just her reaction," O'Brien remarked. "With the things that those kids have done and said, for there to be any comment from GW, to me, is ridiculous."

The fun culminated with O'Brien and McKeown's mid-court meeting after the final horn had sounded in which the animated discussion put both coaches into bad moods and Coach O'Brien with some words afterwards.

"If I am up 30 points and I still have my starters in the game with three minutes to go, you know what, someone better be taking a shot at one of my kids," O'Brien fumed. "That's not good coaching especially when you have 13 kids in uniform over there."

O'Brien added, "When we go play them again on February 16, we better strap it on because they are going to be gunning for us."

As for the rest of the season, UMass fans better buckle up: this ride has a long way to go.

■ men's hoops

firing for 15 before the break.

UMass' comeback run was fueled by standout play on both ends of the court from Crooks (10 points on 5-of-9 shooting from the field and three steals) and Rhymer (a game-high four blocks). Crooks knocked down back-to-back baskets at the tail end of the Maroon and White's 8-0 spurt, electrifying the nearly 5,000 fans on hand.

The squad faced a tall order when it ventured down to the Charlotte Coliseum for the Hardee's Tournament of Champions on New Year's Eve weekend; the other three teams in the tourney (UNC, Richmond and the College of Charleston) boasted a combined record of 22-4 coming in. The Minutemen also had the misfortune of facing the Tar Heels in the opening game, in front of over 13,000 fans who had "The Hive" truly buzzing.

But instead of succumbing to the electric atmosphere and the intimidating Tar Heel tradition, UMass came out swinging and set 7-2 UNC back on its heels from the time that Rhymer controlled the opening tip. Mack looked hot early, burying a rainbow three and a short jumper on back-to-back possessions. Smith added a 13-footer to cap a 7-0 run that left the Minutemen up by six a mere 4:21 in.

The lead would change hands eight times over the next 14:33, until UNC's Will Johnson helped key an 8-0 half-ending run for the 'Heels. The sophomore forward started the spurt by converting a pair of free throws and finished it off my picking Mack's pocket and feeding teammate Joseph Forte for a breakaway layup.

Even though his team led 40-33 at the half, first-year UNC coach Matt Doherty was anything but pleased at the break. "I'm going to have to pay for a chair," was the only indication Doherty gave as to the tirade he gave his team in the locker room.

The furniture abuse apparently worked, as the 'Heels used a decisive 19-6 run at the 11:42 mark of the second half to build a commanding 17-point cushion. UNC forced three turnovers in the span of a single minute and converted them into six straight points en route to a 60-43 lead. The punch-drunk Minutemen seemed to fall apart at that point, leaving Doherty's troops an opportunity to run up the lopsided final score.

The consolation round pitted UMass against 7-2 Richmond. The Spiders launched a staggering 20 three-point attempts in the first half alone, building a 30-25 lead at the break. They managed only six total field goals the rest of the game, but benefited from 23 second-half free throw attempts (19 of which dropped) on their way to a four-point win.

Mack got the Minutemen within striking distance at 60-57 by drilling a three with 23 ticks remaining, but UR's Greg Stevenson then converted a pair of foul shots to seal up the win. Mack finished with a game-high 20 points, while Stevenson (19 pts) reached double figures for his 40th straight time in a Spider uniform.

"Tonight we didn't play badly, we just lost the game," Flint said afterward. "It seems like every game is like tonight."

The New Year brought with it a Jan. 6 home battle with GW as the opening action of UMass' conference schedule. The Colonials (7-9) got off to a phenomenal start behind junior forward Attila Eaby, who knocked down five of his first eight shots to stake his team to a 29-16 edge with 5:31 to go in the first half.

The 6-foot-9 junior led all scorers with 12 points at the break, a big reason for the Colonials' 37-25 halftime edge. The much anticipated showdown between Mack and A-10 Rookie of the Year Sir'Valiant Brown saw both players already in double figures at the break, with 11 and 10 points respectively.

It was Mack who had the hot hand in the early goings of the second half, converting two of his first three shots, including a long trifecta, to trim the GW lead down to seven. Rhymer and Williams then found their strokes, hitting a pair of pails apiece over the next 4:32 to push UMass out in front, 48-42. Brown struggled mightily over the same span, missing five of his first six second-half shots and showing obvious frustration with the officiating.

"I don't think [Brown] gets enough respect from the officials," said GW coach Tom Penders. "For a player of his caliber, he was getting hand checked and bumped a lot."

Crooks added a dozen second-half points to finish with 15 and propel UMass to its biggest offensive half (31 pts) and game (71) of the season. DePina chipped in with a game-high six assists and no turnovers in 28 minutes at the point. The Minutemen as a team didn't commit a single second-half turnover and finished with a season-low eight giveaways.

UMass' Jan. 9 date with Xavier again meant venturing into a hostile foreign arena: the Musketeers entered the game with a perfect 7-0 mark in their new facility. The Cintas Center crowd got a slap in the face, however, when the Minutemen jumped out to a 25-12 lead. Xavier coach Skip Prosser struggled to find a defense that could stop UMass, switching from man-to-man to zone and instituting a full-court press with very little success.

The Musketeers also struggled to put the ball through the hoop, shooting a dreadful 23 percent from the field in the first half. XU's saving grace was the free throw line, where the team garnered 13 of its 24 points en route to a six-point halftime deficit.

But try as they might to gain ground in the second half, the Musketeers were buried under the deft shooting of Mack (8-of-19, 4-of-10 from three) and the foul shot mastery of his backcourt mates (Crooks and DePina a combined 10-of-12 from the line). The loss spoiled a breathtaking performance from Xavier's sophomore center David West, who poured in a career-high 28 points and grabbed 11 rebounds.

St. Bonaventure (9-5) had won three-straight over UMass at its own Reilly Center, giving Mack and company added incentive to steal a win from the Bonnies on Jan. 15.

The first half was a see-saw affair, with SBU seemingly gaining control as halftime approached. But a five-point outburst from Rhymer helped UMass talk seven of the half's last eight points, sending the game into the break deadlocked at 33-all.

The Maroon and White rode a 7-0 spurt out of the blocks in the second half that led to an 11-3 run and a 46-36 UMass edge. But the Bonnies simply wouldn't go away, swinging the lead back 53-53 on Massiah's first three with 5:22 remaining.

The two teams would wrestle with the advantage the whole rest of the way as the Minutemen handed SBU the lead on successive turnovers before snatching it back on two Rhymer freebies that capped a 7-1 run. Crooks stepped to the line with 20 ticks remaining and a 64-63 lead, but his second shot wouldn't stay down and the Bonnies were left with a window through which to steal the win. Flint chose to focus his defensive scheme on SBU's Kevin Houston (20 pts) on the play, leaving junior Massiah open for the decisive dagger.

"Coach said they might double team Kevin and told me if I got it, shoot it," Massiah said. "It felt good. When it left my hand, I knew it was in."

Such magic from the outside wasn't needed against Dayton (10-7), as the Minutemen scored their first 21 points within eight feet of the rim and hit 51 percent from the field overall, their best shooting percentage since the season-opening win over Iona. UMass pounded the ball inside relentlessly against the undersized Flyer front line, allowing Rhymer to combine with Micah Brand and Jackie Rogers for 49 of UMass' 62 points on 20-of-27 shooting from the floor.

"We didn't have any lapses in our minds," Rhymer said. "We came out 'stalling the box' as we call it, and we found a way to win."

As proficient as the Maroon and White was from the paint in the early goings, Dayton was doubly deadly from beyond the three-point line. Flyer guard Tony Stanley connected on his first three attempts from international waters, and the team's 6-of-7 effort from downtown was the single biggest reason Dayton walked off the court at halftime with a 32-26 lead.

"We let them shoot like that," Flint said, "If their guards get in a comfort zone, they'll kill you. But we made them earn their shots in the second half."

The home team's second-half run to victory also included a bit of comedy with roughly seven minutes to play and the Flyers up by a bucket. Williams stood at the top of the key and fired a perfect pass into the chest of Flint in front of the UMass bench.

"You know that in my day, I would have shot it," Flint said.

The coach probably wished he could have been in uniform for the team's clash with Duquesne (7-11). The Dukes were forced to take the floor without Wayne Smith (18.1 ppg, 6.6 rpg) one of the conference's most athletic forwards and the team's hands-down biggest weapon. Smith suffered a bruised heel in DU's prior game against Labalbe and was a game-time no go for Coach Darelle Porter.

Even without Smith, the Dukes played some inspired basketball over the first half to hang within striking distance of the Minutemen. A raucous crowd of almost 7,000 fans got into the action early when UMass' inside game began to take control. Rhymer and Brand teamed for eight points, eight rebounds and five blocks over the first 20 minutes) but Duke Jack May (15 points, six boards in the first half) helped his team close to within six, 34-28, at the break.

"I told them in the locker room, you've got to put a foot on 'em," Flint said. "Once you put a foot on 'em, you've got to step on their neck."

Mack did most of the second half stepping, connecting on 4-of-6 from the field in the second set (including 2-of-4 from downtown) to finish with a game-high 25 points. Rhymer notched his second double-double in as many outings (13 pts, 12 reb) and the team racked up season highs in points (80), steals (11), blocks (13) and field goal percentage (55.2 percent).

"They're one of the hottest teams in the league right now," Porter said. "If they continue playing like they have lately, they can beat anyone."

The biggest test of the year still loomed ahead: a Jan. 27 battle with archrival Temple at the Liacouras Center in Philadelphia. But having already bested the rest of the A-10's toughest, Brand and the Minutemen view their showdown with the Owls not as a roadblock, but just another turnstile on the way to the division crown.

"We know that if we come to play the way we've been playing, they're just another team that we can beat," Brand said.

the fact that Nehls' situation is at least something she can control.

"I can't play, but there isn't anything I can do about that," Smith said. "Whether or not Caroline plays is up to her."

Nehls doesn't necessarily agree with her fellow forward in that regard. She points to a two different hurdles, other than her numbers, as being keys to whether or not she can regain her status as a Maroon and White starter.

The first, and arguably the most important, is communication between player and coach. Nehls has yet to have a one-on-one discussion with O'Brien about her situation, and as a result has no clear picture of either what she was doing wrong prior to her demotion or what she needs to do to right the ship. That aspect is made doubly difficult by Nehls' admittedly non-confrontational demeanor.

"She hasn't talked to me about it, and I haven't gone to her either," Nehls said. "I'm not the kind of person who would jump into her office and make a big thing out of it. I'm more inclined to just sit back and deal with it."

The second is lack of opportunity: reserves on the UMass squad spend much of practice either watching the first five or providing bodies for them to work against. It is not as if a breakout practice outing is going to suddenly catapult Nehls back into favor with O'Brien.

"If you're not starting, you're not involved in a lot of what goes on in practice," Nehls said. "I end up doing more watching than actual participating."

That leaves game time as Nehls' only stage on which to reprove herself to both her coach and her teammates.

She is the first player off the bench in the team's battle with conference top dog Xavier, largely due to the fact that her speed and athleticism are sorely needed to combat the Musketeers' high powerful run-and-gun offense. She is on the floor a mere seven minutes in, and she connects on her only two field goal attempts of the first half within a one-minute span.

Her line at the break is solid: 2-of-2 from the field, five points, two rebounds and no turnovers or fouls. Though her team trails by 14, Nehls looks as if she herself has exorcised a few demons.

"There was a great atmosphere at this game, really emotional. It was hard not to get caught up in it," Nehls said. "I knew coming in that I'd probably get to play a big part just because of how much experience I have against their players. I really know their strengths, and what they are going to do."

The rest of the game is not nearly as kind to the junior, who bricks all four of her second-half shots and commits three personals in only seven minutes of play. There is a brief moment of redemption when she rejects a Xavier shot, though a subsequent 9-0 run by the Musketeers pushes any satisfaction, as well as the game, out of reach.

"Fighting so hard to get back into the game, then watching them run a fast break the other way and score easily, really takes the wind out of your sails," Nehls said. "I missed some shots, some really open shots, in the second half. You can't do things like that and expect to win."

Especially when you're fighting for a chance to even take those shots in the first place.

* * * * *

Dayton's UD Arena looks, from the outside at least, to be somewhat devoid of character. It's simple gray façade and rowr of unmarked metal doors give no indication of what to expect inside, no hint as to the setting for the next chapter for the UMass women's basketball team.

Passing through one of those doors, the players embark down the one access route to Blackburn Court: a concrete ramp, pitched down at such a steep angle that one slip would seemingly send them tumbling.

As the Minutewomen descend into the depths of UD Arena to face the Flyers, Nehls knows that the window for winning back her spot is might already have slammed shut. With every game her replacement, transfer Siiri Liivandi, seems to grow more and more comfortable and effective within O'Brien's system.

"I don't even know if it's possible for me to get my spot back," Nehls said. "Joanie might very easily stick with this lineup for the rest of the year. Even when I do get put in I'm thinking in the back of my mind, 'Am I just going in to give Jen or Siiri a breather?' It makes me wonder exactly what my role is now."

That uncertainty may have been exactly what landed Nehls in this position in the first place, according to her coach. O'Brien points to last year, when the team's frontcourt players meshed almost perfectly in terms of roles and contributions, and speculates that Smith's injury may have done more damage than just robbing the Minutewomen of a single player.

"When Nekole went down, we had too many people whose roles had changed, trying to do too much," O'Brien said. "Caroline was one of those people."

That would leave Nehls in what seems to be a no-win situation: she was benched for trying to do too much, yet she needs to prove herself offensively to get back into the lineup. O'Brien has said that she sees Liivandi blossoming into a key scorer for this team, capable of 8-10 points and 6-8 rebounds every time she takes the floor. Nehls feels that such production is easily within her own reach, but that she has been a role player too long and needs to work on developing a scorer's attitude.

"That's what makes it all the more frustrating: I know the offensive moves, but it seems like in games I'm hesitant to make them." Nehls said. "I've never had anyone telling me when I need to score before, judging me on how much I contribute to the offense."

In some games it looks as though that scrutiny causes Nehls to become even stiffer, to abandon her instincts completely and try to become an entirely different player than she is. She has started thinking about what she needs to do instead of relying on her natural abilities and drive to get results.

"I need to get that attitude back," Nehls said. "I need that recklessness, that fire that I used to play with."

In the first half against the Flyers it is the rigid, tentative Caroline Nehls who comes into the game with her team up by five. She commits three personals and turns the ball over in only six minutes on the floor. Her footwork is all wrong, and she's slow to react when Dayton's Mandy Witner, a little-used bench player, begins muscling in and taking control of the UMass paint. The Maroon and White's lead disappears, leaving the team down by a point at halftime.

But midway through the second half, something happens that seems to shake No. 43 awake and rekindle her roundball spirit. A few long rebounds off missed Flyer threes lead to UMass fast breaks. Suddenly it is as if she's back in the Randolph High gym, running transition drills with the Rams. It is the old Caroline Nehls, the free spirited player who cannot help but smile as she pounds up the floor and finishes off a break with an easy deuce.

For a few minutes there is no pressure, no controversy over who's good enough to start for this team and who isn't. There is only basketball, the way it used to be.

"I felt it there, once it turned into a running game: the fire," Nehls said. "This feeling I have right now, this feeling of fulfillment, is all I want. I don't want to be constantly disappointed with myself."

* * * * *

The airport in Dayton isn't exactly bustling. There are only three sit-down restaurants in the entire complex, and most of the customers are clustered around the establishments' televisions to watch the end of the NFL playoff game between Baltimore and Oakland.

Most of the Minutewomen, however, have opted for a different means of entertainment. Nekole Smith, ever restless with her new role as the team's morale booster, has seized control of the intercom at Gate C14 and launched into an impromptu comedy routine. Some of the passengers seated around the gate seemed annoyed with her antics, but most cannot help but at least smile when she gives a near-perfect rendition of Tommy Lee Jones' search directive from The Fugitive.

Caroline Nehls sits a few benches away from the rest of her team, her legs stretched out before her and a look of contentment on her face. She seems to have found a little peace at the tail end of the trip, a bit of satisfaction. A large part of that came courtesy of her teammates; Nehls spent much of her time in Ohio sharing experiences and advice with another struggling Minutewoman, Paige Harris.

"We talked a lot about the pressure of starting, and the ups and downs that both of us are going through," Harris said. "It's tough for me because I'm starting and struggling as a freshman, and she's been starting her whole time here and suddenly has to come off the bench. But I think she's doing a good job of handling it, and I wouldn't be surprised if she's back in before long."

But for now, that's not even a concern. The team will get a few days off before returning to practice, a few days for Nehls to relax before she has to begin worrying again about starting rotations, or statistics, or basketball in general.

It will give her time to think about other things, things that she calls "important."

"I have already started looking at grad schools," Nehls said. "I've known since my junior year in high school that I wanted to get into physical therapy as a career, and Duke has a great program."

Aren't the Blue Devils known for one other thing too?

"Yeah, they have a pretty fabulous basketball team too," Nehls laughs. "But that's coming from me as a fan, and as a fan only."

Nehls says she has no interest in staying involved with the sport once she graduates from UMass, no desire to try her hand at coaching or any other administrative aspect of the game. She is appreciative of how far the sport has gotten her already in life, but she would like to start getting by on her other merits once she trades in her hightops for a cap and gown.

But that is still more than a year away. For now, she is focused on rekindling her competitive drive and winning back her spot in the UMass starting five. She has already brought scores of fans to their feet with her achievements on the court, but she still feels that her basketball best is yet to come.

"It's about knowing that I gave it my all, and that's something I feel I haven't done yet," Nehls said. "I still haven't lived up to my potential. I want to leave here with a good feeling about how I came through this; I want to finish with a bang instead of just fading away."

Junior Nehls struggling with roundball reality

TRAVELING VIOLATION

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

As the team bus pulled away from the William D. Mullins center on that clear January morning, Massachusetts point guard Kathy Coyner could hardly contain her excitement.

The team's lone senior made one call after another from her cell phone, telling friends and relatives the good news: roughly three hours earlier, with the birth of a girl named Elyse Katherine Coyner, she had become an aunt.

A few seats behind her, junior Caroline Nehls gazed absently out the window and silently contemplated another recent turn of events: three games prior to the trip, after two-plus seasons as a starter, she had been benched.

Each player had more to think about than the impending journey to Ohio to face Xavier and Dayton. Each had suddenly been given a reminder that there is more to life than basketball, the game that had seemingly defined them during their time thus far in the Pioneer Valley. For Nehls, it marked a turning point in her view of the entire future.

"I am at a point now where I am looking ahead, and for once basketball isn't in the picture," Nehls said. "The sport is what got me here, but it's not going to continue to be the moving force in my life."

But it is not Caroline Nehls who has turned her back on basketball. It is not even the other way around. It is a natural point for any athlete, when the game that once seemed larger than life is reduced once again to nothing more than that, just a game. But it is a point that almost always comes sooner than expected, and is virtually impossible to prepare for.

* * * * *

Playing on the road is simply a series of adjustments. The venues aside, each new city offers the traveling athlete little more than a slight change in weather, a different name on a pizza box, a slight variation in the local newscast. The view from the bus window becomes a little different, as do the walls of the hotels that become home.

Cincinnati's Vernon Manor isn't the typical home-away-from-home for the Minutewomen. The 77 year-old hotel, modeled after an estate in England, exudes an ambience of timeless class from its inlaid hardwood floors and ornate moldings down to the massive fireplace that dominates its dining room. It is a far cry from the cramped simplicity of the anonymous chain hotels that these players have become used to.

It is the perfect setting for Nehls to revisit her past, and the chain of events that has led her to the crossroads of collegiate hoops.

Roundball became her fuel for the future back in high school, when she studied the game under the tutelage of Coach Doug Garrett in Midlothian, Virginia. A natural athlete who also excelled at volleyball, Nehls enjoyed an almost ideal learning experience in her first year of organized basketball: with eight seniors, the Midlothian squad had no shortage of experience. Winning also became a familiar concept to Nehls, as the squad captured its first-ever Regional Championship.

The Nehls family then pulled up stumps for Randolph, New Jersey, where Caroline faced a markedly different situation once she stepped onto the court for the Randolph High Rams.

"I pretty much became the go-to player at Randolph," Nehls said. "We had a bunch of great athletes, but not too many strictly basketball players."

Nehls was quick to make her mark with the RHS team, earning all-county and all-conference accolades in her very first season there. Her junior year was even more fruitful, as she added third team all-state honors to her resume.

But even as Caroline reeled in the individual praise, the Rams struggled to shake a perennial bridesmaid tag: they finished second in the county to Mendham and second in the conference to Columbia in each of Nehls' seasons on the roster. That prompted Coach Don Grant to tinker somewhat with his star center's style during her final season in a Ram uniform.

"During my senior year, my coach tried to get me to broaden my game a little bit," Nehls said. "He let me dribble with the ball, and post up, and he even said I could play out on the wing if I wanted to. But mostly I liked running, trailing on breaks and getting my points in transition. I put up some pretty decent numbers, too."

That fast break prowess stemmed largely from Nehls' mastery of track, a sport at which she excelled nearly as much as she did at basketball. She was the Rams' top competitor in both the 200 and 400-meter dashes, the latter of which she earned three county championships in.

Such a well-rounded game gave Nehls a world of opportunity once it came time to choose a college; both Rice and Duquesne made attempts to lure the 6-foot-2 standout to their respective programs. But once she took a closer look at UMass, Nehls says her mind was made up as to where she would play college ball. She came back from her recruiting trip thrilled by the team's penchant for playing uptempo basketball.

And from the time she finally put on a UMass uniform, she did nothing short of explode onto the Maroon and White hoop scene.

"People saw some things in me that even I wasn't expecting," Nehls said. "I mean, I started the first collegiate game I ever played in. I think it had a lot to do with the style of play the team had then, of running and moving the ball up the floor quickly. I did a good job of picking up easy layups on fast breaks."

Such a good job, in fact, that local sportswriters began drawing comparisons between Nehls and former UMass greats Crystal Carroll, Melissa Gurile and Kara Tudman. They pointed to the freshman's combination of speed, size and instincts as rivaling that of the Minutewomen's best post players ever. It didn't take long for Nehls to make believers out of both her teammates and coaches, either: her first collegiate double-double (10 points, 11 rebounds) against Hawaii in her fourth game cemented a spot for her among UMass' first five.

It would take a stress fracture of her right foot, suffered shortly after Christmas 1998, to finally knock Nehls out of the Maroon and White lineup. She was relegated to cheerleader status for eight games, three of which ended in defeat for the Minutewomen. More importantly, Nehls was forced to watch other young players against whom she had held an edge, like fellow freshman Nekole Smith, blow past her on the basketball learning curve.

"It was hard enough to deal with the fact that I had never been injured before," Nehls said. "But it was also a huge setback to my progress as a player. Before I got hurt, I was ahead of Nekole. While I was recovering she definitely surpassed me, at least in the eyes of the coaches."

Even after Nehls' bum wheel had healed, Smith remained the weapon of choice in Coach Joanie O'Brien's arsenal of young guns. The Michigan native started the final 14 games of the '98-'99 slate, while Nehls was pushing herself back toward her pre-injury form and watching her own playing time increase exponentially in the process.

By the end of her freshman year, Nehls had shrugged off the weight of expectations and grown into her role on the team, on her own terms. She had not tried to play beyond her own capabilities, a trap that befalls many first-year college players.

"The coaches learned my freshman year that I'm not a big scorer. I bring a lot of things to the court, but flashiness is definitely not one of them," Nehls said. "They saw that they could count on me for stability, as someone who comes out and plays hard defensively but isn't going to carry the team on offense.

"Certain players were their high school's big stars. I wasn't like that; I've always been more of a team player."

That very mentality seemed to be enough for Coach O'Brien at the onset of Nehls' sophomore season, as she penciled No. 43 back into her starting lineup. Nehls responded with a number of performances that seemingly belied her disregard for offense: she connected for a career-high 20 points against cross-state rival Boston College in the fourth game of the season, then racked up 10 points and six rebounds in an overtime loss to New Hampshire three nights later.

Nehls remained among O'Brien's chosen quintet through all 29 of the team's games that season, turning in highlight-reel nights against conference foes Dayton (18 points, six rebounds) and St. Bonaventure (16 points, six boards). She was particularly effective over the last seven games, when she shot a remarkable 62 percent from the field, over 22 points higher than the team's average for the season. Smith took on a role of spelling Nehls off the bench, providing a bit more offensive punch (11 points per game in conference play, compared to six for Nehls).

But it wasn't as if Nehls spent her floor time looking over her shoulder; in a system like O'Brien's that preaches defense, the fleet-footed forward held a decisive edge over her higher-scoring but slower counterpart.

"Nekole and I used to kid each other a lot, but I always had the last laugh when it came to defense," Nehls said. "The joke was that she didn't have a problem with defense – she just didn't play any."

But heading into this year's hoop slate, Nehls had stopped laughing and faced up to a harsh reality: with the Minutewomen lacking somewhat in the scoring department, O'Brien was leaning toward starting Smith alongside second-year phenom Jen Butler in the D. UMass forward Smith had honed her offensive game to a razor-sharp point, perfecting a low post turnaround and fadeaway jumper that made her virtually impossible to stop one-on-one in the paint.

Enter the slayer of giants, the one force capable of stopping even the most prolific player cold: injury. One minute Smith was pounding up and down the hardwood of the Mullins during preseason practice; one fateful jump-stop later, she was lost for the season with a dislocated left knee.

Suddenly the team was without its second-leading scorer and rebounder from the previous season, leaving a number of question marks and, on another level, a window of opportunity.

"Obviously it hurts to lose a player of Nekole's caliber," O'Brien said. "But if there is any positive that can come from a situation like this it's that certain other players will get a chance to step up and try to fill that spot."

To Nehls, that meant one thing: another chance to have her name echoed across the expanse of the Mullins during the announcement of the starting five.

"Before Nekole got hurt, I had accepted the fact that I wasn't going to be starting," Nehls said. "When she went down, I knew it was an opportunity for me to prove that I belonged in the starting lineup. All it would take was me becoming more of a contributor on offense."

It took a mere three regular-season starts for Nehls to do just that; she notched the second double-double of her collegiate career (16 points, 11 rebounds) on Nov. 26 against Holy Cross and dropped 13 points on Rutgers five games later. The latter was particularly satisfying for the New Jersey product, who had suffered arguably the most miserable game of her career at Rutgers the year before (10 minutes, zero points, three turnovers).

"Most people play better in their home state, but I seem to be the exact opposite," Nehls said. "I seem to have this tendency, having all these people there, to be too uptight and worried about making mistakes."

That home state plague struck again at this year's St. Peter's Holiday Classic tournament in Jersey City on New Year's Eve weekend. Nehls struggled through 15 minutes of dismal play (1-for-4 from the floor, two points, four fouls, two turnovers) in the opening round against Alabama, and had insult added to injury (or vice versa) when she suffered multiple scratches to her face fighting for a second half rebound.

Things didn't get any easier for Nehls in the consolation battle with Farleigh Dickinson, a game postponed by weather until New Year's Eve. The forward remained ice cold (two points, three personals) and was again knocked off the floor in the second half, this time with a broken nose courtesy of Knight Kyle Schmitz's elbow.

"The Jersey tournament was absolutely awful for me," Nehls said. "I just played horribly, and getting hit in the face just made it that much worse."

The sting of that elbow was nothing compared to the subsequent slap Nehls would get when the team reconvened for practice on January 2. O'Brien called her team into a huddle and uttered five ominous words: "Things are gonna be changed." As the room broke for warm-ups, Nehls had a feeling inside that made the official announcement a mere formality. By the time the first five was announced for the onset of drills, she had already began coming to grips with the fact that she had lost her spot.

Xavier University's Cintas Center is the type of facility that puts the "art" in "state-of-the-art." From parquet hallway floors to multi-colored tile mosaics on its shower walls, the school spared no expense when constructing the 43-million dollar complex that opened last summer.

The Cintas Center is a symbol of just how powerful the sports dollar is nowadays. It is the perfect icon for the present.

"When you know you're not looked to as a starter anymore, it changes your whole mental approach," Nehls said. "I'm a huge competitor; I have a really hard time sitting back and watching during something like this. But the hardest part might be that I feel Joanie doesn't have as much confidence in me.

"After starting all 29 games last year, through the ups and downs, I thought that I had proved to her that I could bounce back from the low points. I showed, at least in my mind, that I could have a two-point night and come back to score 10 the next. But I guess not."

The coach herself sees it in much more straightforward terms: the first five are all about production. It is a simple equation, regardless of the individual factors involved.

"When we're struggling, I'm not adverse to making changes; the kids just have to deal with it," O'Brien said. "This is a sport where how you respond to things is just as important as anything. Caroline wasn't giving us what we needed, so I felt it was time for a change."

Nehls' teammates share that basic philosophy, especially Smith. Having been forced to watch all 18 of her team's games this year in street clothes on the bench, she points to

It has been a tough season for UMass forward Caroline Nehls (43). The junior had her nose broken in a horrible outing against Farleigh Dickinson and lost her starting spot shortly thereafter.

University gets closer to distance

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts system is moving forward with its distance learning initiatives after the appointment of Dr. Jack Wilson as chief executive officer of UMass Online.

Wilson was appointed by President William Bulger and was chosen from an original list of approximately 80 candidates. A committee interviewed five finalists and then Wilson was chosen to head the new learning initiatives to officially be launched on Feb. 7. He will work out of the President's office as a part-time consultant until May at which time he will assume a full time position, earning $235,000 a year.

"Thanks to the innovative work done by campuses and the bold vision of President Bulger and the Board of Trustees, the University of Massachusetts is strongly positioned to offer excellent web based educational opportunities," Wilson said in a statement to the press. "The University's reputation for excellence, nurtured since 1863, is now being combined with 21st century technology to attract a whole new population of students who, otherwise, would have been forced to delay or cancel their educational dreams. A high quality online program has become a key part of any leading University's portfolio. I can't wait to get started."

A co-director of the Paul J. and Kathleen M. Severino Center for Technological Entrepreneurship at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Wilson is also a professor of physics, engineering science and information technology and management. He is also the founder of LearnLinc Corp., a group that provides a virtual classroom environment for corporate training and professional development. Some members of the committee to hire the executive officer expressed their excitement about the appointment.

"I am thrilled that Dr. Wilson is joining us. He was my first choice," said Professor Linda Enghagen, director of the Amherst campus Division of Applied Management, said in a statement to the press. "Dr. Wilson brings a depth and breath of experience and a clear understanding of the different roles that faculty play."

UMass Online has already integrated into the University with a series of online courses available for the spring semester. Some classes that are offered online are introductory art management courses, Introduction to Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration, the Fundamentals of Marketing, Professional Nursing II and Elementary Psychology among others. Also offered is an MBA Professional Program, Master's Degree in Public Health for Professionals and a Master of Science in (Nursing) in Community/School Health.

According to the University, online courses are geared towards working professionals, military personnel, people with disabilities, parents with small children and those who have transportation problems in regard to reaching the UMass campuses. Online courses still allow for communication between faculty and students featuring online "office hours" and the ability to communicate with other students via email. Students are also required to take courses during the same period as typical University semesters. Some of these courses include readings, projects, chat rooms, illustrations and sometimes video.

These courses allow for students to access the web 24 hours a day, seven days a week and provide for studying and, in some cases, getting a degree at home. Textbooks for the class can also be purchased online.

However, there continues to be lingering doubts about the concept of distance learning in the University environment. The distance-learning plan spans to encompass all five UMass campuses and will serve students all over the world.

Lasting concerns about the way that the measure will be funded and how classes will be taught have not been fully addressed at the present time. In an attempt to dispel con-

The watchful eyes of Student Trustee Seth Avakian (left) and Speaker of the Senate Jim Eltringham peer carefully through the blinds of the SGA office's front door.

Oh the places we will go, or not go, this is what has been left on the table for the Student Government Association this semester. With new elections beginning on February 1, the SGA may be faced with questionable outcomes, which could ultimately lead to a negative or positive semester for SGA members and students alike.

Past

Controversy left the SGA emptyhanded at the end of last semester as the student Judiciary in their case ruling threw out the Senate. The SGA overall has had a trying semester, coming into this year's first Senate election with problems prior to Election Day. A list stating all of the members of the Greek community was found in the Worcester Dining Hall election booth, bringing up questions of the legality of the situation and whether or not it was an intentional act. This led to controversies between the Executive Cabinet and the Senate, and left a noticeable lack of presence by SGA President Jeff Howe and Student Trustee Seth Avakian.

As the Senate pressed on so did the Executive Cabinet, with charges filed against House Speaker Jim Eltringham. These stated that Eltringham had tampered with the number of commuter seats allotted making the election unconstitutional. There was a clear indication that 32 out of the 34 commuter Senators living in Greek houses were also holding unconstitutional positions. The constitution, stated that, "Membership in the non-residential on campus housing is defined by the University as people living in the following places: anyone living in Hillel House, anyone living in Family Housing, anyone living in a Greek house, anyone living in a swing space."

However this definition was considered incorrect under the University of Massachusetts Housing Services.

"In our minds the Greek houses and the Hillel House are considered off campus, we offer freshman and sophomores exemptions to live in those recognized houses," Director of Housing Services Mickel Gilbert said.

Confusion over the electoral districts contributed to much of the controversy, resulting in a tedious fudiciary hearing. Throughout the investigation emotions ran high. The ultimate Intransigence left the Senate on the rocks.

As Chief Justice Gabriel Tavares presented the ruling at what was to be the last meeting for the Fall 2000 Senate, all hell broke throughout the SGA. In addition to the Senate being ruled an unconstitutional body, an investigation was mandated on Eltringham regarding his code of student conduct. The decision left an air drama in the SGA office, and resulting in insult slinging via the group's email list.

As crazy as last semester seems, it did not only end with a dissolved Senate, but with legal action in the process as well. With talk of a possible lawsuit against the University as well as against the SGA itself left many in the dark. At the end of last semester, both Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos and an unnamed University lawyer had been contacted regarding the legalities of the case.

Aside from the legal action being taken place, over the winter session an appeal was prepared and submitted to the judiciary regarding the decision handed down by the Judiciary.

"We appealed the case and it should be being filed right now and then go on to be reviewed by the student Judiciary," Eltringham said.

Through all the trauma and personality politics the SGA managed to regain a semblance of order towards the end of the semester with ex-Senators continuing to press on. This permitted the SGA to work informally in individual committees and for the Executive Cabinet to press onward allowing the government to end their semester on a relative high.

"I think what is most important this semester, and what we will be trying to do for the next few semesters is restoring the students faith in the SGA. We need to show the student body that even though we have flaws we can still work together."
- Bryan Santos, Former Southwest Senator at large

Present

With a new semester in the works, and a new Senate arriving in the future, the SGA begins their second election race of the 2000-2001 year set for February 16. The completion of the winter session and a looming workload for the future has left many unsure of what the spring semester will bring.

"Having the Senate thrown out has been a kick in the butt. I didn't expect to have to be dealing with an election right now," Eltringham said. "I'm in the process of getting the official numbers for each electoral district from the Registrar documented so if there going to throw out this next Senate they'll have to find something different to come to me with."

With disillusion lingering from the past semester the question of whether to expect fewer returning Senators is a central issue. One main focus of discussion has been whether or not a number of the previous Senators from the Greek community will run again.

"I'm disheartened by the negative stereotypes that have been thrown out against the Greeks. We need to see a Greek presence in the SGA now more than ever," Eltringham said. "I would say to any member of the Greek community that you have a real opportunity to show the other members of the Greek community that all is not lost. You still have the ability to be productive and be involved despite what others may say about you."

Chair of the Ways and Means committee Mike Taugher offered his opinions on the subject of Greek involvement. He expressed disappointment in the fact that 30 willing individuals were lost due to the termination of the Senate.

However, the issue of how the Greek community will fit into any future conception of the SGA still remains. Many question the legitimacy of the constitutional ruling regarding the housing status of the Greeks. The debate persists as to whether or not Greeks fall within on-campus non-residential or commuter brackets.

"If the Greeks ran under commuter seats again I think that they would be subject to the same crap as last semester, but I pray that it [the election] go smoothly," Avakian said.

Eltringham shared similar feelings when it came to the up and coming elections and it's possible outcome.

"These ideas of an on-campus non-residential district is like raking apples, oranges and bananas and calling that an electoral district fruit," Eltringham said. "Hopefully if the right people win all will go well, but if not I think were going to have problems. Nothing surprises me anymore."

In terms of what has actually been accomplished by the SGA in the past semester and into the winter session, some ventures have been more successful than others. The Ways of Means Committee has continued to press on with the budget finished for the spring semester.

"We're a hundred percent ahead from where we were at this time last year," Taugher said. "We have all of our data inputted into the computer and the discs completed, we have our

Car crash claims life of student

By Chris Thompson

A University of Massachusetts student suffered fatal injuries after losing control of his car, crashing through a bridge guardrail into a brook late Sunday night, according to police.

Officials at Holyoke Hospital pronounced Peter A. Jekanowski, a junior majoring in Journalism and Political Science, dead shortly after his arrival.

"A witness reported seeing Jekanowski heading toward Hadley from South Hadley on Route 47. After coming off a curve into a downhill, Jekanowski lost control [of his car] and headed into a guardrail on the Bachelor Brook Bridge," According to South Hadley Police Lieutenant David LaBrie.

Jekanowski's car then traveled down a 60-foot embankment and landed on its roof in the Bachelor Brook.

"The car's windows were completely submerged," LaBrie said. "Only the broken undercarriage of the car was visible to the first officer on the scene."

A witness to the crash called the South Hadley Police Department, and Robert Whelihan Jr., the first officer to arrive at the scene, attempted unsuccessfully to rescue the victim by breaking a car window with his flashlight. Whelihan and a second officer, Steven Fleming, were able to rescue the victim by breaking a window using a sledgehammer borrowed from a passer by.

Police rescued Jekanowski just minutes before South Hadley Firemen dressed in wetsuits arrived on the scene.

"We responded to the call in 2 or 3 minutes so he couldn't have been underwater for more than 30 minutes at the most. [The medical technicians] tried unsuccessfully to resuscitate Jekanowski on their way to the hospital," LaBrie said.

An autopsy determined drowning to be the cause of Jekanowski's death. State Police have yet to conclude a reenactment of the crash as a part of their investigation into the cause of the accident, LaBrie said.

Jekanowski, 20, was born in Northampton and graduated from Hopkins Academy in 1988. He was living at 38 Roosevelt St. in Hadley at the time of the accident.

Peter's parents, Sally and Peter Jekanowski, have created a scholarship fund in conjunction with Easthampton Savings Bank in Peter's name.

"Peter's parents have asked sympathizers to send donations to the memorial fund in lieu of flowers," according to Easthampton Savings Bank Hadley Branch Manager John Vassallo.

Donations may be sent to the Peter Jekanowski Scholarship Fund, care of John Vassallo, Easthampton Savings Bank, P.O. Box 81, Hadley, MA 01035.

Smith professor questions Sudan's affairs

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Sticks and stones may break Smith literature professor Dr. Eric Reeves' bones, but names can never hurt him.

Dr. David Hoile, the director of the European-Sudanese Public Affairs Council, has called Reeves a "poor academic." The London based group released a report in December entitled "The Return of The 'Ugly American': Eric Reeves and Sudan." The title is a reference to the 1958 novel by William Ledcrer and Eugene Burdick, about an ignorant American diplomat in a Third World country.

"From the safety of his office in Smith College, Dr. Reeves has emerged as quite an armchair strategist with regard to the Sudanese civil war," the report states. "He has relied on hearsay, second and third hand claims, sources that are self evidently all too questionable."

Reeves dismisses the criticism.

"The Council is little more than a front for the National Islamic Front. It has gone after the New York Times, the Washington Post, and a number of other people," Reeves said. "It is nothing more than propaganda."

Reeves does not consider the Council to be an objective view of his work.

"Nobody subscribes to it, nobody buys it and nobody wants it. Everybody I have talked speaks of it only with contempt. Nobody takes it seriously," Reeves said.

Sudan is the largest country on the African continent, and has been under a military dictatorship since June of 1989, when NIF forces staged a military coup in the capital of Khartoum.

The Central Intelligence Agency estimates that the war has caused 1.5 million deaths and millions more displaced persons. Much of the fighting occurs in the south of the country.

"There are so many reasons for the war," Reeves said. "It's geography, it's religion, it's race. The South is African; the North is Arabic."

The predominant factor in the struggles seems to be the oil supplies in the south.

"A thousand mile pipe line extends from the south to Port Sudan on the Red Sea in the north. And the money goes to Khartoum," Reeves explained.

The Sudan People's Liberation Army announced on Jan. 28 that they had attacked and destroyed three oil fields, which the Khartoum government denied.

The Sudan News Agency reported that the attacks were repulsed, and called the SPLA's announcement "sheer propaganda which was aimed at raising morale."

Reeves disagreed.

"I think I am in a position to know the record of the SPLA and the Khartoum regime," Reeves asserted, handouts finished and will be able to start our training sessions with RSO's."

Committees that were dissolved along with the Senate have been looking to rekindle their flames, one being the Dining Services Committee.

"We're going to be looking at different issues this coming semester. The Director of Food Services loved our impute that we had to offer," Eltringham said. "It was also nice to be able to see actual results without a committee that was formed that was bettering the overall student community."

Other former Senators have also continued to work over the break in order to prepare for the up-and-coming semester. Former Chair of University Policy Michael Whitehouse explained his plans for the new semester.

"I'm working on a proposal to get a wafiveable fee for execrit cars as well as build up more community spirit on campus," Whitehouse said.

"I would like to get more students involved with administrators and be able to build relationships with them so that they can be more involved."

Other Senators also have been looking towards the future of the SGA and building ideas as well. Former Southwest Senator at large Bryan Santos explained his hopes for this semester.

"I have been working on a motion to get the parking stickers costs lowered by twenty-five percent," Santos said. "I think what is most important this semester, and what we will be trying to do for the next few semesters is restoring the students faith in the SGA. We need to show the student body that even though we have flaws we can still work together."

With these accomplishments have also come some down falls to the lack of having a Senate present. RSO's have been left with little funding from the SGA, and have been coming looking for emergency funds.

"We have had problems with RSO's coming to us looking for emergency funding and the fact that there is no Senate, it has hurt these RSO's," Taugher said. "They [RSO's] have been coming looking for money but the fact that we haven't met has affected that. We have had a couple groups that have been very disappointed, because they were supposed to get funding, but without the Senate, the funding did not get allocated as promised."

> "If the Greeks run under commuter seats again I think that they would be subject to the same crap as last semester, but I pray that it [the elections] go smoothly."
> – Seth Avakian, Student Trustee

Taugher continued to talk about the effects that the lacking Senate has caused students as well as organized groups on campus, and how this has been a negative reflection of the SGA.

"We claim that were working for the students and things aren't getting done, and it's a direct result of not having an active Senate," Taugher said.

Future

At this present time the future of the SGA has yet to be decided, but will lie in the hands of the new Senate. This semester brings not only a new governing body, but also a tight agenda full of motions and events. With one election to begin and another to be planned, the Presidential position as well as the position of Student Trustee will be up for re-election this coming spring.

Other proposals on the agenda for the SGA this semester include a road trip. This will take the Senate to offer courses in Plymouth, MA in conjunction with the University of Massachusetts, Boston.

Early plans include potentially offering online courses in Plymouth that could include students viewing lectures online. The school is not a sixth campus, but rather a location that allows students in the Plymouth area to take classes offered on the Boston campus. These classes will be smaller than typical University classes and will focus primarily on business.

It is hoped that at some point bachelor's and higher degrees may be offered at the school. Some are hailing this as yet another venture by the UMass system to reach out and allow students from different parts of the state the opportunity to pursue a University education. Tentative plans are also in the works for a UMass campus in the area of Brockton.

Although the details of distance learning have not yet been fully explained causing concern for both students and professors, the UMass system as a whole is making plans to advance the program and make it available to people across the United States.

cerns about funding issues both President Bulger and Chancellor David K. Scott spoke to the student body late last September. Scott explained to students that he felt that distance learning was necessary for the University and would give opportunities to people who would otherwise not be able to attend UMass.

"The prediction is that every person in the work force will require 30 credits every seven years," Scott said. "I believe that UMass needs to be a player in that, not to replace professors with television screens, but to give a chance to those who would never have an opportunity to set foot on this campus. We feel that we have something very special to offer."

Bulger also did his part to try to explain funding of the initiative. He maintained that the money was coming from a cash reserve and that the money would not be taken away from any of the campuses.

"The University is prepared to make an investment of 10-15 million dollars," Bulger said. "We call this an investment because we are confident that it will be made back."

Kristen Herrmann, a senior History and Political Science major, expressed the opinion of many of the students in attendance asking of Bulger. "You suggested in your opening remarks that you needed the support of UMass students to go forward with Distance Learning. If it becomes clear that the student do not support Distance Learning, will you then end the program?"

"I think a question can be posed to the students," Bulger answered "But I don't believe that the University should be governed by those who are just passing through."

Faculty members continue to struggle with issues surrounding distance learning and details such as intellectual property. A recent newsletter from the Massachusetts Society of Professors addresses the struggles and issues a warning to professors.

"The MSP continues to urge faculty and librarians to refrain from signing any contracts with UMass Online until the intellectual properties, working conditions, and governance issues have been resolved," the newsletter stated.

However, the administration is moving forward in its distance learning venture and plans

"and if the SPLA tells you they burned three oil fields and destroyed a drill, then you can take that to the bank."

No third party conformation of the attack has been made.

"I have only seen commentary that confirms the attack. I have not seen any aerial reconnaissance or satellite reconnaissance – they may be classified," Reeves said.

Sudan has been under sanctions from the United States since 1997. The Treasury Department cited human rights violations as a reason for sanctions.

"After finding the policies and actions of the government of Sudan, including the prevalence of human rights violations, including slavery and the denial of religious freedom, constituted an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security of the United States," a Treasury Department document stated.

meetings around to dorms such as Southwest and Orchard Hill in an attempt to get more student awareness as well as involvement.

"I think it's going to be really neat. We're trying to have motions ready so that we'll be ready to go by March," Eltringham said.

On the Executive branch's home front, they are working to further projects directly affecting change on campus. Avakian spoke on the issue of working towards building a new Student Union and Athletic Center on campus.

"I'm going to continue to push for a new Student Union and Athletic Center," Avakian said. "I'm also working closely with the Board of Trustee's and looking closely at the ALANA students numbers, because they are disturbingly low and that's something were concerned about."

Spring Concert is also another project in the works as the SGA and University Production Council have teamed up in planning the event. It has been a work-in-progress however, due to a lack of funding.

"Last year there was a large amount of money that did not get deposited into the Spring Concert account. So we started this year with a deficit," Eltringham said. "We also ran into problems because the SGA agreed to pay for any unsold tickets, but the money was taken out of the Spring Break account not the SGA account, so instead of last year's $150,000 budget, we are dealing with $135,000."

Eltringham continued to explain that even though there has been a lack of funds, the SGA was not about to let this affect them.

"No one wants to see this program fall on their watch, so well do whatever it takes to keep the concert on schedule," Eltringham said.

As the SGA looks into the future with uncertainty, one point has been made more than a handful of times.

"We need to restore the students faith in the SGA and represent them, and I plan do so once again this semester," Santos said.

AMHERST – Forum: Informational Meeting. A new group to promote cultural and educational programs on campus will meet at 7:30 P.M. in the Conference Room of the Hillel House on Tuesday, Feb. 6.

SMITH COLLEGE – "Prelude to a Concert: Music from the Ashes." This symposium, which focuses on the music of Jewish musicians who were imprisoned in Theriesienstadt and eventually murdered, is part of the Anatomy of Exile project of the Kahn Liberal Arts Institute. Featured presenter Adrian Sushnic is music director of the London Chamber Players. The event will take place in the Alumnae House Living Room on Wednesday, February 7 at 8 p.m. For more information, call Rene Heavlow at (413) 585-4292. Admission is free.

MUSIC PERFORMANCE

SMITH COLLEGE – "A Touch of Class Featuring The Boys Choir of Harlem, Inc." This classical music event will kick off Black History Month on Thursday, February 8 at 7 p.m. John M. Greene Hall. Tickets are $15 general public, $5 seniors and Five College students. Admission is free for Smith College students.

UMASS – "Halau Hula Ka No'Eau: Hula from the Big Island of Hawai'i." Michael Pili Pang, the artistic director and founder, has elevated the traditional hula, music and chant to a high level of artistic expression through innovative choreography. The Asian Dance and Music Program Series presents this portrayal of Hawaiian cultural myths in Bowker Auditorium on Sunday, February 4 at 3 p.m. Tickets range from $7 to $20, and are available through the Fine Arts Center box office (545-2511).

NORTHAMPTON – "Ritmo y Candela/Rhythm and Fire." Fifteen Latino musicians will perform at the Academy of Music at 2 p.m. on Sunday, February 11. Tickets are $10 in advance (available at For the Record in Amherst) and $12 at the door.

HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE – "Wally Cardona Quartet: Trance Technology." The Wally Cardona Quartet and a live DJ will unite ancient rites, modern technology, and rigorous structure in this performance. "Trance Technology" offers a window into the use of music and dance as a transcendent and spiritual experience for the 21st century. The significance of trance travels beyond both cultural and age barriers and has roots in many ancient religious ceremonies. The event will take place in the Main Dance Studio at 8 p.m. on Thursday, February 8. Tickets are $10 general public, $5 students. For more information, call the Fine Arts Center box office (545-2511).

This calendar, which previews local events of interest to under-represented groups on campus and in the community, runs on Wednesdays. Submit notices of events to Tanya Mannes, Diversity Editor. Standard entry forms are available in the Collegian office.

A future made of virtual insanity

It was recently announced that the University of Massachusetts has hired Dr. Jack Wilson to be the chief executive officer of UMass Online, the distance learning program for UMass.

This is another dangerous step in the direction of the 'virtual classroom.'

This is not a critique of Dr. Wilson. By all accounts, the man is fully qualified and excited about his new employment. He wants to take the UMass Online experience to places that is has never been and even greater levels of being a complete, comprehensive learning experience.

This is exactly the task that Dr. Wilson's bosses hired him to perform, with full confidence that he would rise to the task.

It is precisely this task which is anathema to the student body of the University of Massachusetts, and to which the Collegian stands firmly in opposition.

"I believe that UMass needs to be a player in that, not to replace professors with television screens, but to give a chance to those who would never have an opportunity to set foot on this campus," Chancellor David K. Scott said about distance learning.

We are not being snide when we ask, if you've never set foot on the campus of the University of Massachusetts, yet you are a student, what besides a screen would be your professor? How would you learn but from some canned program or streaming video online?

Can that be called learning?

We do not believe so.

An integral part of being in college is simply being in college. The college experience cannot be downloaded, encrypted, broadcast, or guarded with an expensive password.

Sitting in front of a computer screen allows for no human interaction. It does not allow for questioning a professor. You cannot gauge the reactions of those students around you. You lose something tangible, something that we feel is irreplaceable when the transition from tradition classes to virtual ones is made.

Anyone can buy books and read them. A syllabus is not worth several thousand dollars, or even the paper that it happens to be printed on.

The college experience is just that. It is the learning in the classroom as well as the learning outside of it combined that create a well-rounded individual with the ability to succeed in the modern world.

You do not encounter diversity on a computer screen. You cannot come into contact with difficult views that cannot be ignored from a distance. The growth of knowledge is possible in a virtual classroom – the growth of a person is not.

The Collegian is not knocking Dr. Wilson when we feel that he should never have been hired – not because we question his competency, but because we feel that his job and, indeed, his division, his whole area of work, should not exist.

The virtual classroom comes ever closer. Unfortunately.

Harsh homecoming

KEN CAMPBELL

I spent another winter here on campus, safe and sound, away from my parents. The differences in our generations are rearing their ugly heads. Their once quiet son has become a sarcastic cynic who won't back down from a verbal battle. That is, one he thinks he can win. My ego isn't that large – I pick my own fights, and they are the ones I can win. My moderate conservative views clash with my mother's liberalism, and I am too much like my father for either of us to be able to stand each other for more than a weekend.

Life in the Campbell household has reached the point where the first-born is almost forgotten, except for the monthly bill from the University with my name on it. This was painfully apparent when I went home for Thanksgiving. My room still contained my mattress, but it rested on the floor. My desk was cluttered with old receipts and tax forms from the past seven years. A spare kitchen chair sat under my window. Quite simply, it wasn't my room anymore.

My family went out for dinner that night. Rather, my parents and my sister went out for dinner. I was reading in my room when I realized that the house was suddenly quiet.

Thanksgiving break ended sorely, as my mother and I got into an argument at a post-Thanksgiving dinner at my Uncle's girlfriend's house. I left early.

Christmas Eve was held in the same place. This time, my mother forbade me to "talk politics." Apparently my mother's definition of politics includes everything but the weather. Anytime I opened my mouth I got a dirty look from her. I settled into a quiet fury and sat in the living room, at the right hand of my grandfather. The fact that my grandfather and I, as well as my cousins, were all in the living room should have sent a message; in true New England households, family and friends are entertained in the kitchen. Strangers are relegated to the living room.

Drunken revelers wandered in and out of doors to smoke. The front door wouldn't close properly. Every time a nic fiend went for a fix, the front of the house – where my aged grandfather sat – got quite chilly. I quickly grew tired of rising to shut the door. My father and I would tell them as they left to shut and bar the door, but they paid little attention.

Eventually, my temper boiled over and I told an inebriated friend of my uncle's exactly what I thought of them and their lineage. They were too drunk to care; I was too mad to notice. I again left early.

While the details are different, I have heard similar stories from other twenty-somethings. It appears as though I have finally reached that stage in life where, as much as I love my parents, I can't stand them. Part of the problem is that the old adage is true. The generation gap, something I spent most of high school trying to deny, has hit hard. No matter that we enjoy the same music, or that I know what shows and films they watched, or that I have good friends as old or older than they will not change the fact that we are different. They don't understand. Granted, for all I know of early seventies pop culture, I am no closer to understanding them. It is entirely frustrating to have what you consider to be fairly good news be treated lightly. Or worse, things you consider dire news are ignored. Parents simply sell their kids short by writing off their college experiences as youthful folly.

Grades. That seems to be all they care about. Lord knows I try, but life keeps getting in the way. Not a social life, or a party life, but plain old life. Debts to be paid and collected. Deadlines to make. Phone calls to return. Mail to answer and send. Appointments and meetings to be made and kept.

You spend eight hours a night hunched over a keyboard, trying to make sure everything is right so that in six hours you can get up and run to class. You take notes, then hit the office to meet that night's deadline, and then more class. Remember to eat someplace in there. All work and no play makes Jack a dead boy.

It seems a somber way to start a new semester, but every so often we must remember that not every class is an easy A, not every cloud has a silver lining and not every editorial will make you laugh.

A Valentine's Day appeal: don't let it get you down!

"Hello, it isn't about the gift. It's about the cute little conversation hearts that say, "Be Mine" and the card you get when someone cares enough (sniff, sniff)."

KATIE LANDERS

(Katie's note: I'm sure there will be plenty of articles on the Valentine Holiday, but I wanted to be the first to get one in. I originally wrote this article in early December, giving it a somewhat strange slant.)

I'm cursed on Valentine's Day. Now, those of you who have known me for a while know that I had the same boyfriend for all four years of high school. However, the only good Valentine's Day that I highly enjoyed was freshman year of high school. This is due to the fact that every year after that, we broke up for a short time right before V-Day until after my birthday in March. Coincidence? I think not. Then last year, well, just forget that. We'll just say that first semester I made my freshman mistake and it brought me a cold welcome to the start of the second. So for the past five years, Valentine's Day has been pretty far off from visiting my doorstep, and at the rate I'm going right now, I'm not holding my breath this year either. My picture tells everything right there. It's hideous, and it certainly isn't helping my cause. I tell you, it's the horizontal stripes.

So, with Feb. 14 looming in the next few weeks, I thought we might talk about how you can make it better. If you have a significant other, that's great, I applaud you. If not, then that's even better. At least you're at college with no strings. For my own feelings on relationships, I guess I've just learned sit on the fence. It takes too much energy to care about it either way (whether I have one or I don't). With this in mind keep reading, because I guess I am going to give some ideas that maybe everyone can use.

For you couples out there, good for you. If both of you are students at UMass then you get to see a whole lot of each other. For Valentine's Day I suggest you do something that you both enjoy. I'm not thinking dirty here, but something more recreational. For example, you could take a small road trip to New York and see the sights, or you could do something that I have wanted to do forever: go see the Children's Museum in Boston. Guys, it's not a chick thing. The museum is probably a cool place to relax and see some fun stuff. If the other half of the relationship is at a distance, then it would probably be cool to just go visit the other and reflect. Reflect on what, who knows? I'm starting to sound like Delilah, Creeps.

Single girls out there, who cares? I really hope you are not reading this and hoping you snag a guy in the next week. It's just another holiday created by the folks at Hallmark to boost sales. It's a big revenue day. The day will pass like all others and it won't make you a lesser person because you don't have someone. You have your girlfriends, and that's the best kind you can have. They don't spit in public, they call you back, and they'll tell you when your hair looks bad. Go out with those friends that night and do something fun.

Now to the single guys at UMass. Oh boys. Well, all I can say to you is that you luck out that day. Not only do you not have to spend any significant dollar amount on a girl so that she's happy, but you don't have to hear her whine either. Now fellow girls, don't take this the wrong way. It's just that I know the way that I have behaved in the past and I know how other girls can be. Just watch "Real World" Seattle. Stephanie is the worst to Nathan in every episode. He sends her that huge card to tell her how much he loves her, and she just accuses him of cheating. Guys might do stupid things, but girls can be just plain spiteful. The best suggestion I can give to single guys is to buy your best-friend-that's-a-girl a flower or a card or something. Just make sure that you won't be giving her mixed signals – meaning she knows you guys are just friends and it's a friendly gesture. I wouldn't want to make things complicated for you. Flowers from Atkin's in the Campus Center only cost about a dollar, and you might even be able to use your UCard.

Valentine's Day is not a day for extravagant gifts. Sometimes between a couple holidays can turn into a giving war over who gives the better gift. Hello, it isn't about the gift. It's about the cute little conversation hearts that say, "Be Mine" and the card you get when someone cares enough (sniff sniff). Enjoy Valentine's Day, it only comes but once a year. Things could be worse. It could come twice like the dentist.

Letters to the Editor

Aid a little girl

To the editor:

I want to thank Sam Wilkinson for addressing the generalization I made when I stated that the SGA are "all a bunch of white, middle class students" who are reproducing white supremacy through their unquestioned white privilege. This statement was taken out of context when I was interviewed on the current funding situation with SLSO. By no means did I want to denote that everyone in the SGA is white, or that they all are middle class, or even that they are all racists. I also didn't want to claim that everyone in the SGA is propagating the unethical funding framework for SLSO. What I did want to exemplify is that the group of students who are propagating the consumer fee-for-service model for SLSO, leading the frontal attack on affirmative action, and attacking the appointed ALANA seats, are all "white," middle to upper class, students. This specific group of people in the SGA are steeped so deep in their white privilege that they truly believe a "you get what you pay for" model for public legal services is acceptable, and that having Affirmative Action and appointed seats for ALANA students is discriminatory and unconstitutional. If we define racism as a historical process that has led "whites" to achieve an upward mobility at the expense of people of color, and that process is legitimized juridically, or in this case through a governing body, then we have a form of institutionalized racism that assures restricted resource allocation to racially subordinate populations. In order to be against Affirmative Action and appointed ALANA seats you have to believe in a racial equality that just simply does not exist. The people attacking the SLSO funding framework are the same group who are reproducing this new form of institutionalized racism: racism under the guise of equality. It is this particular group for whom I claim to be "white," privileged, and reproducing white supremacy at UMass. I hope this clarifies the sweeping generalizations and I apologize to those who don't fall into the categories listed above.

Gloss and Stiles save Last Dance

By Jennifer Chasen
Collegian Staff

SAVE THE LAST DANCE
directed by Thomas Carter with Julia Stiles, Sean Patrick Thomas

Convinced I was way too mature to enjoy a film aimed toward the same screaming young girls who sport N Sync posters on their walls, I approached Save The Last Dance fairly pessimistically. Evidently, I wasn't nearly as mature as I thought.

The film functions almost as an updated version of West Side Story and stars Julia Stiles as Sara, a high school senior whose mother just passed away. After having botched her Juliard audition, she moves to inner city Chicago with her jazz musician father (Terry Kinney) and falls madly in love with the hard-working, street smart Derek (Sean Patrick Thomas). Derek, while teaching her the fundamentals of hip-hop, helps her to overcome her newfound phobia of ballet and together they prepare for her next Juliard audition. Throughout the film, the couple fights to succeed in an area where inter-racial relationships are seldom accepted.

Hokey? Yes. Predictable? Of course. But the film has a warmth and romanticism that the watcher finds extremely contagious. You can't help but want this little blonde suburbanite to make friends in this tough neighborhood. Kerry Washington, Chenille, plays the part of best friend well, and Bianca Lawson as Nikki and Fredro Starr as Malakai are convincing antagonists. Sean Patrick Thomas shines, however, and emerges from the film looking sensitive and endearing. You can't help but want to take him home.

Kerry Washington shows Julia Stiles the ropes.

Julia Stiles was adequate, but it is more than evident that she is not a dancer by trade. Apparently the actress had to undergo a months worth of extensive dance and Pointe training before the film, and given the brief time she had been dancing, her work is impressive. But while her pirouettes and pique turns are technically correct, she lacks something to transform her into a truly believable ballerina.

The film was choreographed by Randy Duncan and Fatima (of the ever illustrious Sisqo's Shakedown) and concludes with a solo dance by Stiles that combines both elements of ballet and hip-hop. The steps introduced were innovative but the scene was strangely reminiscent of the end of Flashdance minus the leg warmers and scrunched hair.

The direction by Thomas Carter (who also directed Swing Kids in 1993) was enjoyable, as was the sound track. It combined an orchestral score with a lot of current hip-hop, a mix that was strangely effective.

This MTV-produced romance may not be well written, but it is amazing what hip urban clothes and high-energy dance sequences can do for a poor script. While this is not the movie I would pick to take your grandmother to go see, nor do I think it is worthy of the number one spot at the box office, Save the Last Dance is pleasantly surprising for the under-twenty-five generation and a nice January date movie.

Snatch fast-paced and humorous

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Snatch
Directed by Guy Ritchie with Brad Pitt, Benicio Del Toro
Vinnie Jones
Playing at Cinemark Theaters

Guy Ritchie recently became known for being the man that married, of all people, Madonna. If he continues to make gritty, upbeat action-comedies like Snatch, he'll soon be known for a lot more.

Ritchie has stumbled on a formula, a way of making entertaining films with remarkable simplicity (at least on the surface). His quick cuts, fast-paced, almost disjointed narrative style and quirky characters – all of which made his first picture Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels a cult hit – reappear in the highly enjoyable Snatch. It may not be fine art. It may be ultra-violent. It may even be a bit contrived. Then again, who cares? A Guy Ritchie film will certainly never be boring.

COURTESY IMDB.COM
Brad Pitt and co. negotiate a deal.

What strikes one as odd about Snatch is that people, more specifically critics, have focused almost exclusively on the action or the violent aspects of the film. Called a "rock-em, sock-em caper" by someone (Rolling Stone, I think), Snatch is being ignored for what it is – a humorous, and, indeed, ingenious piece of storytelling. Ritchie's ability to shuffle seamlessly between a huge cast of characters and keep them all distinct, fresh and perpetually cool is truly impressive. That achievement in itself would have made Snatch a good movie, but writer/director Ritchie adds enough narrative to make everything come together.

COURTESY IMDB.COM
Jason Statham, Brad Pitt, and Stephen Graham discuss mobile homes

Frankie Four Fingers (the depressingly underused Benicio Del Toro) has stolen a diamond, but not just any diamond. The diamond is 84 karats. In the mean time, a Turkish boxing promoter (Jason Statham) is being pressured by British mob boss Brick Top (Alan Ford). As a result he must get involved with a 'pike' boxing champ (Brad Pitt in an absolutely riotous comic supporting role). Throw in a bit man, a couple of jewelry salesman, a dog and a New York mob boss and you get a somewhat murky picture. However, Snatch never becomes too murky. At worst, it becomes a case of follow the jewel thief. And in the end, everything does indeed make sense, in a twisted kind of way.

Ritchie's strong visual sense only helps him handle the scope of the story and the characters. His ability to make both funny though is what makes Snatch work. Following a style similar to Grosse Pointe Blank, the movie's action scenes are punctuated by extended periods of minutia and deadpan humor (of the British variety here). In turn, the colorful cast of characters almost wears its personalities on its sleeves. That is, each has an immediate characteristic, and almost always a bizarre one, that makes them instantly recognizable and instantly funny. There's not a whole lot of depth here, but Ritchie doesn't demand that of the story. If he can't convey something in ultra-streamlined, sub-minute packets, then, for him, it's probably not worth conveying at all.

David Fincher responded to on-set worries about the abnormally high number of cuts in Fight Club by saying, "We're not making a movie, we're downloading information." And maybe that is where Ritchie will find his place – in a new ultra-digitized, fast-paced, on-demand world.

However, he does it though, Ritchie can download, or whatever you want to call it, all he wants. Snatch is just too entertaining to be ignored.

New album from Meat Puppets fails to Innovate, and barely manages to entertain

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

MEAT PUPPETS
Golden Lies
Breaking Records/Atlantic

"Oh my god, I must be dreaming/ if this is a dream, then why am I screaming?" – "Take Off Your Clothes" from this album.

Well, those lyrics are the only effective thing on the Meat Puppets Golden Lies, and that's only because they accurately describe what most everyone will think when they listen to this complete waste of time.

The Meat Puppets had their three songs of fame — the single "Backwater" as well as the two songs they performed with Nirvana on their unplugged album – why didn't they then retire?

Golden Lies lacks what might be defined as anything worth ever listening to, ever. Every single song sounds like the one before it and the three afterwards, all a soft mesh of barely distorted guitars, occasional aggressive drumming and flannel shirted playfulness/unhappiness. If there was anything worth reviewing on this non-descript collection of notes and lyrics, it'd be in this review, but there really truly isn't.

"Push The Button" is kind of playful.

"Intro" is artsy and totally unnecessary on any album other than this, where it's hipply avoiding the status quo by being unnecessary.

"Batwing" sounds like Henry Mancini in flannel for a few seconds, then it just sounds like every other song on the album.

"Tarantula" is clearly the Puppets' desperate attempt to release a catchy song that sounds suspiciously like, hmm, another catchy song by the Puppets released some years ago.

In fact, if this band weren't so desperately attempting to release a decent grunge album by hoping that the angry coffee fad of the early 90's would make a sudden comeback, this album might be acceptable as a gateway drug into some of the earlier, decent, grunge music. Unfortunately, the Puppets are clearly waiting to ride the next crummy wave of music that ultimately proved to give us not a good genre to listen to, but rather a few very good albums in amongst a sea of worthlessness. Consider Golden Lies to be like an anemone at the bottom of the ocean, sucking what beautiful fishes of musical creativity that still exist in this dead genre into their tentacled maws of awfulness.

To radio with love, Ryan

Am I the only person alive that still listens to the radio? I hope to God that I am, because I don't think that any self-respecting human being should have to be exposed to the surfeit of crap that it delivers on a regular basis.

Radio has become an overabundance of everything that is so very wrong with today's popular music. If you don't believe me, just turn it on any particular station. Someone will be trying to lick, fight or ride with you at any given time. If you're lucky you'll get a special treat from rappers D-12 as they attempt to, "Shit on you." I'm not making this up! In their song with that title, there's a lyric, "I'm not playing/ I'll drop a squat on you!" That may be the most classless thing I've ever heard in my life. And I've hung out at the Boston wastewater treatment plant.

I should stop being so skeptical. I'm going to drop the critic bit for a moment and show my gratitude for everything wonderful that FM radio continues to deliver me each and every day of my run of the mill, boring old life.

Dear Radio, thanks for giving me an erection – Love Ryan.

Who needs women, when, apparently my radio really wants to jump my bones; especially when I'm in my car. My drive from North Attleboro to Amherst consisted of two hours of flipping from one station to the other. Each pre-set station button I pushed was a different sexual act: Button 1: "I wanna, lick, lick, lick, lick you from your head to your toes. Button 2: "Imagine this, we were both butt naked/ banging on the bathroom floor." Button 3: "You and me baby ain't nothing but mammals so let's do it like they do on the Discovery Channel." Button 4: "Pinchin' nurses asses as I'm jackin off with Jergins, and I'm jerkin, but this whole bottle of Viagra isn't working." Button 5: A woman is faking an orgasm for the Friday fake-out" on WAAF. Button 6: "Hey, it's Bi-Day here at WBCN: Now, Shelly, lick Shannon's nipple, and stick your finger in her…"

At what point did the radio get a license to become an unadulterated porn distribution company? With Ludacris asking about my fantasies, the Bloodhound Gang doing it doggy style, and Shaggy committing shameless acts of adultery, the radio has hit an all-time new low level of sleaze; and I love every minute of it. It's almost as amusing as watching Moby dress up as a pimp and flash gold chains at his twelve dollar hooker, Gwen Stefani. The radio really gets my thanks in this category though. It has taught me a very valuable lesson. Next time my significant other catches me talking the next-door neighbor; I'll step up and take the responsibility like a man. Or I'll just say, "It wasn't me."

Dear Radio, thanks for playing the same song over and over - Love Ryan

Today I heard "Outside," by Aaron Lewis and Fred Durst twelve times. That's eleven and a half more times than I wanted to.

Dear Radio, thanks for stealing my U2 tickets - Love Ryan

Here's a question you may be asking yourself. Why does every radio station have U2 tickets and I do not? I've been asking it. It seems like every radio station holds one million tickets for the three U2 shows in Boston, but every person I know is complaining that they have none. It's ailing to listen to the radio and hear, "Caller nine wins a 50 pack of U2 tickets, as long as you have the phrase that pays." Hey, I've got a phrase that pays for you. "Your radio station blows, give back the U2 tickets so that hard working people can buy them."

I worked in a radio station two years ago; I know some of the tricks they pull. Firstly, "professional prize winners" win most of the prizes. They are people who sit home and listen to every radio station with a specific procedure for winning. They then sell the prizes for a 100% profit. Secondly, when a radio station gives away tickets, they are usually the worst seats in the house. This also makes them the cheapest seats in the house, which means less cheap seats for people trying to purchase them. It would clearly be better for everyone if the radio stations didn't have any tickets at all, and people just paid for them. The tickets would be cheaper, more available and the world would be a happy place. Oh wait, I forgot. I don't even like U2, and it's not a beautiful day, so shut up.

Dear Radio, thanks for playing the same song over and over - Love Ryan

"Cuz I'm on the outside, I'm looking in. I can see through you…"

Dear Radio, thanks for destroying my self-esteem - Love Ryan

Ah, leave it to the world of hard rock to have nothing but confidence. For some reason, it's become an increasing tradition to hate yourself, and in the case of Papa Roach, hate your father.

The top five most uplifting lyrics on the radio are; 5. "I got genital warts and it burns when I pee/ I tie a rope around my penis and jump from a tree/ You probably wanna grow up to be just like me?" Eminem – "Role Model" 4. "Mutilation's out of sight and I'm contemplating suicide." Papa Roach. "Last Resort" 3. "Cuz I'm a loser, and sooner or later you know I'll be dead." 3 Doors Down – "Loser" 2. "There's nothing I believe in more than my own insignificance." SR-71, "Politically Correct."…and the number one most uplifting lyric comes from a song you may have never heard before, I. "Cuz inside you're ugly. Ugly like me." Aaron Lewis and Fred Durst, "Outside."

RYAN BENHARRIS

I love it that musicians are so happy. I'm beginning to see why today's artists idolize Kurt Cobain. Not because he was a genius, but because he put a shotgun to his face.

Dear Radio, thanks for playing the same song over and over - Love Ryan

"All this time, when I felt like this won't end; was for you!"

Dear Radio, thanks for ruining my youth - Love Ryan

Okay, so this is the point where I explain to you where the idea for this column came along. Picture if you will; riding in your car and the DJ on your favorite local radio station says, "Coming up next is 'Rapper's Delight.'" Is your stomach swelling with anticipation yet? Mine was when I heard this. I waited through the commercial. I took deep breaths and prepared myself for the song that I used to worship.

Amidst all of the "throw your hands in the air and wave em' like you just don't care" and "rip rop ribidy doo's" all I could think was; who's terrible idea was this garbage? And, the part about going to the guy's house and not liking the food. What the hell was that!

It's so sad that it took "Rapper's Delight" for me to have some sort of shocking epiphany about the direction of pop music. However, I slighted myself of any discouragement when I realized that today's music will never be made fun of. I'm sure that in twenty years, our children will have nothing but respect and admiration for "The Thong Song." Hey women, imagine telling your grandchildren about that gem? "Ooh kids, this used to be my favorite song. Whenever they played it at the clubs I took all of my clothes off and shoved my half naked, skanky rump in the face of some guy that I didn't know. It was worth it though, because the "fine lookin' woman" who "backed that ass up" the best won a free t-shirt!"

One important aspect to note is that radio is not the home of bad music. It's the burial ground for good music. Most of the material played on the radio is stuff that I used to like. If you ever listen to Casey Kasem's countdown, the song that is number one is always the song that was abundantly popular two months ago, and not anymore.

That seems to be the statute for American radio though. Obliterate quality with redundancy, while feeding innocent listeners with a demolition of society's most beloved form of art. It's something that I'd love to talk more about it, but there's this really cool song playing right now that's giving me a stirring urge to move to Biloxi and buy lighters.

Plain Rap fails to make dent

PHARCYDE
Plain Rap
Delicious Vinyl

There was a time when Pharcyde was a welcome addition to a rap community showing signs of stagnation. Their first album, Bizarre Ride II the Pharcyde, was lighthearted and featured little of the predominant sounds or rhymes of the day. No bitches. No hoes. No guns.

It was a humorous escape from the popularity of Dre's The Chronic. However, by 1995, their second album Labcabincalifornia showed signs of aging and strain, and while they got an extended look after the mainstream success of the first single "Drop" and the song's video directed by auteur Spike Jonze, it was obvious to early listeners' that the band was missing that same playfulness – they were still quirky, they were still different, but the playfulness, something that is always lacking in the macho hip-hop chest thumping, was missing.

And then the band disappeared for a few years. Part of the group left, there was tension, and then the slightly mysterious EP Testing the Waters appeared. And then?

Nothing for a few years, until their latest, Plain Rap, was released without much press or recognition. Rap had changed in the time that they'd been missing. Masta P had ruined a great deal of hip-hop, bling was popular and different part of the countries kept seizing the rap scene for months at a time. Unfortunately for all of that, Pharcyde's latest simply blends into a boring scene, their playfulness taken over by groups like the Black Eyed Peas, their quirkiness replaced by Outkast, and that left them with little to distinguish themselves from most other groups.

Their latest album lacks the subtle, catching hooks that made their last two full albums were auditory pleasures – instead, softer, almost Caribbean, sounds have replaced those beats and it just doesn't come together. Like serpents, the Pharcyde used to slither underfoot, exploring the possibilities of hip-hop with impunity, but now the ground has been reined in, making references to Tupac's death. It's not that the reference is necessarily bad, it's just that the reference is to a person who used be a part of what the group eschewed.

Sure, there are some decent songs on the record – "Trust" is a decent lead off for this album, but it certainly doesn't rank in the top collection of singles that Pharcyde has been responsible for. The beats are secondary and the lyrics just a reminder of what used to be, not what currently is. Perhaps most sadly, the song features a chorus of "there's no one to trust/ you can always count on Pharcyde to bust," except nobody really can anymore, unfortunately. The band has fallen prey to its own vices, to its own defections.

Hopefully, the band is releasing a greatest hits album soon, but after only three albums, a greatest hits album is a stake in the heart of a group that once had such talent and such promise – they're now relegated to greatest hits albums. Their first two albums are necessary and the greatest hits will be fun, but Plain Rap is neither necessary to own and will likely contribute little to the new album.

Sigh.

Honeydogs tired but ok

HONEYDOGS
Here's Luck
Palm Pictures

Billy Bragg and Wilco made the two Mermaid Sessions albums, Folk Implosion splashed on the scene for a few years and good old groups like Cracker still tour, so what space is left for some Johnny-come-lately band from Minnesota?

Not much, unfortunately, especially when their music doesn't exactly stand out from a genre that's provided us with standout albums. The Minneapolis band Honeydogs album Here's Luck is an album that, like some sort of aural doorstop, just sits there. It doesn't really do anything at all, other than give the band the opportunity to sound like plenty of other, more established, better groups.

But in the same vein, Here's Luck doesn't really offend, encroach or threaten the listener. It is literally a non-affecting album, a throwaway of folk stylings with the occasional "oh, wait, isn't this that one band?" query thrown in for good measure. Fact is, they aren't that one band, be it Ben Harper and the Innocent Criminals while they're performing "The Crown" or Blur on "Freakshow."

"Stonewall" is attempt at getting some much needed street credibility in the folk community, but it's not coming. Bragg and Wilco seemed to be recording next door to Honeydogs and the Minnesota band was attempting to glean what they could from the infinitely more talented Mermaids crew only to fall at the expense of the listener. "Wilson Boulevard" has grabs at a Beatles sound.

Sure, they hint at, they leave a scent of being something much better than they are, but Honeydogs really aren't. Rather, they're a musical mirage, a shimmering vision that isn't anything when actually arrived.

Goth popsters hit and miss

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

Bella Morte
Where Shadows Lie
Cleopatra

Atmosphere? Check. Poetic? Check. Artificial drum beats? Check.

Bella Morte's real-label debut is a fun and glossy piece of synthetic goth that manages to check most of the boxes that add up to a quality listening experience.

The lyrics are the undisputable star of this album. When Andy Deane's soaring voice wraps around such gems as "As our faith bleeds into day/ This feeble dream is born/ As dark as winter's voice/ As silent as the rain" and imbues them with a sense of loss and regret, they become inherently believable and beautiful. They tell stories of growing old and apart, of decay, and of love. It works, too, not coming off as pretentious whining by people who've seen too many Dark Shadows reruns but as a confession by people who've seen too much pass away in their lives.

The music backs it up. There is live guitar on some tracks and the bass is live throughout, but it is the synth and the programming that make this album move. Deane and his partner in this two-man band, Gopal Metro, share the responsibility for the music in the background, and they have a dramatic tendency to deliver.

Whether it be for up-beat dance numbers like "The Rain Within Her Hands" or slow, flowing songs like "Autumn," the artificial music makes the songs. It is the interplay between Deane's voice and the orchestration in the background that gives Where Shadows Lie most of its charm. The atmosphere cannot be overstated – when this album is at its best, it is almost like you aren't listening to music, but having an experience, a frozen emotion poured into your brain.

The album isn't flawless, however. At 14 tracks the album is simply too long, with some obviously flawed and ill-fitting material that, if removed, could have made the continuity and overall impact of Where Shadows Lie far greater. The title track, for instance, is a foolish attempt at synthetic punk that falls hilariously flat and it pretty much unlistenable.

Some of the other songs, as well, are just annoying, when the "vocals + programming = quality" formula that backs up so much of the album fails, either because Deane forsakes his natural melody line yelling or because the programming is too jumpy or just tuneless. It's a fine line between brilliance and foolishness when using machines to create music, thankfully, Bella Morte only cross to the wrong side of that line occasionally.

As a whole, though, this album is recommended. Never giving in to the stark minimalism of darkwave or totally surrendering to the beat-per-minute club scene, Bella Morte have made a fine pop-goth album filled with their own emotions, which you may find leaking into yourself.

UPN uncovers our restaurant woes

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

In the spirit of "The Sopranos," "Oz" and whatever else is good on TV, UPN has announced that its new program "When Chefs Attack: America's Filthiest Kitchens" will air during February sweeps. UPN, which along with the metric system and sheepskin condoms is considered one of the biggest losers in American history, will attempt to reverse its losing ways with this new one hour special.

According to UPN the special, produced by Erik Nelson, whose former work included "Busted on the Job," will feature; "Mind boggling, stomach turning surveillance footage taped the world over, that confirms diners worst nightmares: grotesque food tampering by miscreant chefs, waiters and kitchen help." As Nelson told zap2it.com "Americans have always feared what is happening behind closed doors at restaurants. We are going to validate those fears, and most likely create new ones."

Through use of surveillance footage procured by private investigators and district attorneys, among others, the special will truly blow the doors off the kitchens of America's filthiest restaurants. Featured in the program will be various inappropriate acts being perpetrated on the food of patrons including but not limited to defecation. As if that isn't enough, sexual exploits between co-workers are also covered, as are food fetishes (insert your own mayonnaise joke here). UPN Entertainment President Tom Nunan told critics at the biannual Television Critics Association meeting that the special would also include first hand testimonials and information from experts in the area of food tampering. In a related story, no critic has ever given a UPN show a good review.

Much like Amherst-based Bell's Pizza's "tradition of nourishment," UPN has a tradition of quality programming. Whether it is "WWF Smackdown!" Or "Moesha," UPN has always prided itself on providing the very best the small screen has to offer. Adding "When Chefs Attack" to the already stellar lineup will surely skyrocket UPN out of their current position as the San Diego Chargers of television. Oh yeah, and speaking of football, in just a few weeks UPN will begin airing XFL games in where former third string NFL players beat the tar out of each other. While the XFL will forever change the way one watches football, "When Chefs Attack" will forever change the way one eats a tuna melt at a restaurant.

Women's hoop to try for 10 straight tonight at Rhody

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team heads to the University of Rhode Island tonight for a rematch of immense proportions. In one corner stands the favorite, UMass, looking to climb its way up the Atlantic 10 standings. The opposite corner features the underdog, the cellar dwelling Rams, looking to avenge a bitter five point overtime loss to the Minutewomen from Jan. 9.

The first meeting between the two teams ended in an extra frame showdown that featured a game high 28 points from the Maroon and White's Jen Butler. UMass had a three-point lead and the ball with a little more than a minute left in regulation, but a traveling call on UMass gave URI the opportunity that it needed to tie the game. Fundamental basketball put UMass over the top in the extra stanza, as the Minutewomen netted eight of 12 freebies to put the game out of reach.

For the game, senior Kathy Coyner notched 14 points and kicked out six assists while her freshman protegé Cleo Foster put up a career high seven points.

The Rams attack featured three players in double digits, with Neda Djuric leading all URI scorers with 16 points. Shayla Johnson put up 13 in the match-up while Yatar Kuyateh scored 12.

Recently, the Rams' game has been led by Rookie of the Year candidate Lindsey O'Neil. The freshman guard was awarded her third Rookie of the Week Award last week for her 17-point contribution in the team's first conference win over Fordham. The Rams haven't lost a game that O'Neil has started, and Kuyateh has scored in the double digits in 27 of her last 31 contests. Both Kuyateh and O'Neil will be major focal points on the perimeter for the Maroon and White defense.

The Minutewomen will hope to distribute the offensive responsibilities as well as it did against Fordham. UMass featured five players in double digit scoring in the Fordham win, with 14 points coming from Butler. The sophomore will be a major focal point in the paint for the Rams defense, as she was the major reason that the Rams lost the last contest in Amherst.

Playing especially well as of late for the Minutewomen have been Ebony Pegues and Foster.

Pegues has been seeing well-deserved time off the bench for the Minutewomen and is making an argument for herself to be placed back into the starting five. Pegues clutch shooting as of late has been a major factor in deciding the outcome in numerous games for the Minutewomen. UMass has been criticized for featuring only two proven scorers, Coyner and Butler, but Pegues has been proving as of late that she is for real. The off-guard's average of 6.6 points per game during out-of-conference play has increased to 10 points per game since A-10 play began at the beginning of the year. If Pegues can continue to shoot well, the Minutewomen will be able to add a much-needed sharp shooter to its short list of outside threats.

Foster started the second game of her young career against Fordham, and her evolution as a player has been quick and obvious throughout the season. Foster started the season off the bench, getting her feet wet slowly, seeing multiple short spurts per game. Within the first two weeks of the season, it appeared that head coach Joanie O'Brien was comfortable putting the freshman guard into any situation, regardless of pressure or importance. Her role now includes ball handling responsibilities as well as playing a major factor on the defensive end of the court.

Foster's shot, which she was hesitant to let loose at the onset of the season, is beginning to slowly show itself. Although Foster will not be shooting the rock in clutch situations this season, more performances like her seven point contribution against URI earlier this month would greatly increase the Minutewomen's chances of winning for the rest of the season and in the A-10 tourney.

UMass has won its last nine meetings with URI, and if Butler, Pegues, and Foster have anything to say about tonight's game, that streak will continue.

Minutewomen win first of year

By Katie Landers

The Massachusetts women's gymnastics bounced back from its defeat at Michigan State when it defeated visiting Cornell Saturday in its strongest showing of the early season. UMass came out on top with a score of 185.925 to Cornell's 181.75.

Star of the day, sophomore Jen Gendron had strong first place performances on the vault (9.6) and floor exercise (9.7). A fall on the balance beam (9.4) did not prove costly, as she was still able to capture a first place in the all-around.

Senior Tracey Chew tied Gendron for a third place finish on the balance beam.

"Jen's an amazing all-arounder. She's really stepped up. She's a solid and consistent gymnast," said assistant coach May May Leung.

Gendron is noted as being a powerful gymnast who is fun to watch. Now a sophomore, Gendron is expected to be one of the stronger gymnasts for the Maroon and White this campaign.

Freshman Michelle Germano showed the Amherst faithful that she will be a bright spot for the Minutewomen in her first home meet with a strong debut on the uneven bars and the floor.

Germano's scores contributed to the team improving its record to 2-3 on the season.

Competing in her first all-around for the Minutewomen, Germano and is expected to continue in the all-around in future meets. A strong tumbler, the first year gymnast has shown great talent. Healing from a slight back injury, Leung described Germano as reaching a great accomplishment last Saturday in the meet against Cornell.

A surprise on the day was the return of sophomore Katie Teft to Boyden Gymnasium. Teft was injured during the Western Michigan State University Quad Meet with a severe ankle sprain and was unable to compete at Michigan State. Teft was clutch on the uneven bars Saturday, her only performance of the day, scoring a 9.35. The sophomore was unable to compete to the best of her ability, not completing her normal full bar routine.

"I'm still getting over [the ankle sprain]. I didn't compete with my full bar routine. I wasn't ready to do a full dismount," Teft said.

Teft is expected to compete on the uneven bars again this Friday, with a possibility of a reunion on the balance beam. Over the next few weeks the gymnast will slowly be added to different events as she gains her strength back.

Teft, who is a strong gymnast for the Maroon and White, has been missed in her absence, but other gymnasts have been able to step up and help boost scores.

UMass will return to action Saturday as they host West Virginia at 7 p.m. Boyden Gymnasium.

town in the first half). A perfect kickout from Micah Brand set up Winston Smith for an 11-foot jumper that gave the Minutemen a 30-23 cushion with 2:21 to go in the half.

Temple trimmed the halftime deficit to three, 33-30, on a right corner three-ball from Wesby. The Minutemen bumped their lead back up to seven, 45-38, over the first 8:55 of the second half behind threes from Mack and Ronell Blizzard.

AROUND THE RIM: The Maroon and White set the stage for its upset of the Owls by outlasting La Salle 62-58 at Tom Gola Arena Jan. 25. Mack connected for a team-high 23 points to counter a 30-point explosion from Explorer Rasual Butler. Crooks also provided some punch for the Minutemen with 12 points and a team-high four assists.

La Salle (7-11, 1-6 A-10) almost stole the game by scoring 12 straight points (including three straight three-balls from Butler) to take a 58-57 lead with 1:55 remaining.

But Mack nailed down the win by canning a pair of late jumpers, the second with 39 ticks remaining. The preseason A-10 Player of the Year moved into second place on the UMass all-time scoring list with 1,909 points in the process (leader Jim McCoy has 2,374 career points).

"We came to Philly and we got two," Flint said. "There aren't a lot of teams that are going to come in here and get two."

conference lead, and set up a February 27 showdown between the two teams that could end up deciding the A-10 regular season championship.

"I don't think of us as being in first place yet," Monty Mack said after the Temple game. "Once we beat St. Joe's, I'll tell you what it's like to be in first place."

Obviously, Mack and company also have another thing that once eluded them: confidence.

Unfortunately, Saturday's game did have some controversy, as Chaney felt that it was not his team, but the referees that blew the game for Temple. With only a couple of seconds left on the clock, and with the Minutemen up by one, David Hawkins grabbed a rebound off his own miss from the line, and went up for a shot in which the Owl's coach clearly thought that his player was hacked.

"It takes courage to make that call," Chaney said. "The officials are lost out there, lost between what the rulebook says – call every foul – and cleaning up the game. My kids had courage; there were three people out there who didn't."

However, even though Chaney might have had a legitimate complaint about the final play, UMass also suffered though quite a few no-calls down the stretch, most notably when Micah Brand was clearly slapped on the arm going up for a dunk in overtime. Throughout the game, the refs were letting the two teams play, and they were consistently letting them get away with much more than what conspired with Hawkins.

Besides, nothing Chaney could say after the game could deny the Minutemen their day. A season that started off so wrong has suddenly turned around, and a once demoralized team has leapt back into a possession they were used to holding throughout much of the 1990's: first place.

Minutemen battle to deadlock with NU

Shaw paces UMass in tie

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

In sports, there often are contests where the team who played harder and stronger falls short of a victory because of the nature of the game is "a game of inches." This was especially true for the Massachusetts hockey team as they fought to a 2-2 tie with Northeastern in a pivotal Hockey East battle.

Jay Shaw scored the game-tying goal 12:25 into the third period for the Minutemen (7-16-3, 6-9-1 HE) in a game where the Maroon and White hit five posts. On the goal, junior Toni Söderholm broke his stick on a shot from the point. The shot went wide of the goal to the left, but sophomore Brad Nizwantowski corralled the puck and fed it in front to Shaw, who promptly flipped a backhand past Husky netminder Mike Gilhooly for his second goal of the season.

"It was a good play off the faceoff," said Shaw. "I went to the net and no one really picked me up, so I put up an off-angle shot and it went in."

UMass was the beneficiary of an outstanding performance by backup goaltender Mike Johnson. Johnson, a junior starting for the first time since Dec.1 at Boston University, made 33 saves on 35 shots to earn a vital point for the Maroon and White who are tied for seventh in the conference with 13 points, but stand just three points out of a tie for third place.

"I hadn't played in three weeks, but I've been working hard for the past two weeks," Johnson said. "I knew my time would come."

"Mike played really well," head coach Don Cahoon said. "He's a quality goaltender. We've gone with Markus [Helanen] for a while and I thought starting Mike would change things up a bit."

The Minutemen came out strong in the first period, firing 13 shots at Gilhooly. They scored their first goal of the night when Nizwantowski threw a shot to the front of the net and having it deflect off a Northeastern defenseman through the backstop's legs for his fourth goal of the year.

"Lately our line had been struggling offensively," the Peabody native said. "They tried to bring it up the boards, so I picked it up and fired to the front of the net. It went off the D-man's stick and in."

Despite letting in a somewhat weak goal, Gilhooly was nearly superhuman for the remainder of the period. Just under seven minutes in to the period, senior captain Jeff Turner carried the puck into the zone and crossed it to a wide open Mike Warner, who was denied a goal when the sophomore netminder stacked his pads to make the save.

The second period saw the Huskies turn the tables on the Minutemen. After putting forth strong pressure in the offensive zone, the visitors took advantage of a defensive breakdown as Joe Mastronardi took a crossing pass from Mike Jozefowicz and fired it into the net from point blank range at the 4:56 mark. Johnson was left helpless on the play as both passer and shooter were left wide open on the play.

"A lot of times we go up early, get content with our play, and slow down in the second period," Nizwantowski said. "That was what happened tonight."

With slightly over seven minutes to go in the period, an intercept by assistant captain Kris Wallis sprung two-on-one break for the Minutemen. Tim Turner took the puck into the zone on the right side, and attempted to cross a pass to the front of the net, but was blocked. Turner then immediately picked up the puck and fired it toward the top corner, only to see it deflect off of the crossbar and into the stands.

Just over a half-minute later, at 13:20, Northeastern took its first lead of the game. Another defensive mix-up allowed Brian Cummings to get off a centering pass from behind the goal line to a streaking Kevin Welch, who put the puck into the far corner for his first goal of the year.

In the third period, the Maroon and White came out running on all cylinders, pressuring Gilhooly on several occasions. At the 10:12 mark of the period, the Minutemen appeared to have taken the lead, but referee Jeff Bunyon ruled that the puck never went in. Tim Turner took a shot from directly in front of the net and appeared to hit the top corner of the net, but as the puck hit the ground and rolled in front of the goal line and wide, Bunyon immediately ruled no goal, as he was in prime position to see the puck.

The Minutemen continued their unrelenting pressure for the remainder of the game, getting their best chance at victory with 20 seconds to go in regulation. During a rush in front of the net, Warner flipped a rebound toward the shelf, only to see it sail high of the crossbar and into the seats.

Northeastern's only true scoring opportunity over the final two frames came at 3:21 of overtime, when captain Joe Fahey fought off a check from newly added freshman Nick Kuiper to flip a pass to a wide open Graig Mischler, only to see Johnson slide across the crease to swallow the puck in his glove.

"He cut around the outside, it was the third time he'd done that in the game," Johnson said. "I should have blocked the pass, but somehow I slid across and it found my glove."

"I thought the guys played really hard tonight," Cahoon said. "We had all sorts of chances."

The Minutemen are in action again Friday on the road at Walter Brown Arena on the campus of BU in a game that could prove critical in the final Hockey East standings. Faceoff is at 7 p.m.

Lowell loss disheartens Cahoon

River Hawks come out firing, prove too much for Minuteman pucksters

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

In the incredibly close Hockey East race for postseason position, defending home ice is never more important, especially against teams toward the bottom of the conference.

On Jan. 23, the Massachusetts hockey team played host to basement dweller Lowell and it fell to the River Hawks 3-2.

Yorick Treille had a goal and an assist for the visitors, including the game winner at the 5:40 mark of the third period on a shot from the high slot which went through a screen and got by senior netminder Markus Helanen down low.

With the loss, the Minutemen dropped to 7-16-2 overall and 6-9-0 in Hockey East play.

"This was a very important game tonight," Lowell coach Tim Whitehead said. "I think that the guys knew that, and as a result, played a little nervous tonight. I think it would have been more just if it had ended in a tie, but we'll take it. These are two monstrous points."

The Maroon and White are now even at 1-1 with Lowell this season, with an upcoming game at Tsongas Arena on Saturday. Earlier this year, they defeated the River Hawks there 5-4 in overtime.

"I'm very upset about tonight," head coach Don Cahoon said. "I'm not cavalier about this in any way, shape or form. I don't think that we deserved the fate that we got, and I thought that we were dealt a pretty [expletive] hand."

Cahoon, as well as the UMass faithful were repeatedly upset by some calls, or lack thereof, by referee John Gravallese. Several times in the third period, UMass forwards were held up in the offensive zone, including a break-in by Mike Warner just before Treille's game-winner, but Gravallese let the plays go.

"Every game is important, there's no doubt about that," Cahoon added. "Conceivably, we can finish in ninth place [in the league], but should we waste our time thinking about it now? No, because that would be a waste of energy. The only thing that we're worried about is tomorrow's practice and how we're going to right this ship."

The scoring started early, with Lowell getting on the board at the 5:45 mark of the first stanza. Laurent Meunier took a dump in from Ron Hainsey and threw a behind the back pass to Kidney, who was standing right at Helanen's doorstep. Kidney flipped the puck up and somehow it found its way into the net to give Kidney his sixth goal of the season.

Just over three minutes later, at 8:50, with UMass blueliner Randy Drohan in the box for holding, the Hawks used good puck movement to set up a point shot for Hainsey, who was selected 13th overall in the NHL draft last year. His shot was tipped in front by Meunier, who took advantage of some sub-par physical play on the penalty kill.

"This was a huge game tonight," UMass junior defenseman Toni Soderholm said. "It's really disappointing to go down the way that we did. Lowell controlled the play in the first few minutes of the period. We spotted them two goals, and it's tough to come back from that."

The Minutemen got on the board at 11:46 of the first period. On the power play, the Maroon and White kept firing at the net. After Söderholm's shot was saved into the far corner, captain Jeff Turner threw an off angle pass to the front of the net, which Jimmy Callahan deflected to a wide open Tim Turner, who flipped the puck into the netting for his 13th goal of the year.

The only scoring of the second period came during a four-on-four created when UMass' Jay Shaw and Lowell's Ken Farrell got involved in some hitting after the play. With Lowell moving the puck in the Minuteman defensive zone, an attempted crossing pass by Hainsey was knocked to center ice by Tim Turner. The puck slid right onto his brother's stick as Jeff was breaking through the neutral zone. The elder Turner deked to his left to find an opening beneath the pad of River Hawk backstop Jimi St. John.

Both Turners paced the Minutemen with a goal and an assist each, while Meunier led the River Hawks with a goal and two assists.

Kuiper bursts onto scene in Nick of time to solidify UMass blue liners

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team welcomed its newest addition to the squad over the Holiday Break. Freshman defenseman Nick Kuiper joined the team in mid-January and has appeared in five games on the blue line thus far.

Kuiper will have three years of eligibility remaining following this season. In 32 games with the Hawkesbury Hawks of the Canadian Junior Hockey League this year, he had seven goals and 10 assists.

"I was playing in Hawkesbury, and we were struggling a bit," Kuiper said, "I thought that it would be good to finish out the year here."

The rookie made his debut on Jan. 12 against Northeastern. At 6-foot-2, 185 pounds, he has provided a steady presence on defense. For the most part, he has been paired on third unit, usually with Luke Duplessis.

He has not registered a point in three games and rates as a -3 in the plus-minus department.

"Nick is going to be a good addition to our team," head coach Don Cahoon said of the 18-year-old. "He skates real well and has great hockey sense. It is going to be a big adjustment for him both physically and mentally. He will help to add some depth and quickness to our defense."

Although Kuiper is now a Minuteman, it is evident that he does have pro potential down the road. The National Hockey League's Central Scouting Service has him ranked No. 143 on their mid-season draft list.

However, since jumping to the collegiate ranks, Kuiper has already acknowledged that there is a difference in skill level between juniors and college.

"I noticed that everything is so much quicker here," he said. "The guys are a lot stronger, too."

The youngster has also had to deal with a different outlook in the standings. After being a part of a struggling Hawkesbury squad, Kuiper now finds himself as an integral member of a UMass squad that is battling for a Hockey East playoff spot. And since the fact that every game holds extra importance in the final month, there is a very small individual margin for error.

"I'm just going to try to keep it simple and try not to make any high-risk plays," Kuiper said.

In the long term, though, the Montreal native has aspirations of a career in the professional ranks.

"I'd like to be drafted and after that, play pro hockey," Kuiper said. "I'd like to play in the NHL someday, but if I don't, I'll have a good education to fall back on."

defeating UMass by a score of 149-125.

There were many bright spots in this hotly contested match, but one that stood out was the performance of the freshman Dexter. The Centerville native broke her own school record in the 200 breast... again. For the second time in as many meets, Dexter bested the previous record with a time of 2:20.57.

Dexter did not shine alone as Hunnewell won the 200 free and another rookie, Shauna Nielson, took the 500 free. Once again Kazanjian, Hunnewell, Buckley and Dettloff proved that they had no equal in the 200 free relay.

The Rutgers meet marked the last home appearance for seniors Julie Dragon, Sharyn Harrison, Sarah Newell, Shannon Rowell and Robin Velona.

With the loss the Minutewomen drop to 9-3 on the season but now face a crucial meet at Fordham on Feb. 3.

Individuals shine for men's indoor track in pair of meets

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

While the rest of the UMass student body was at home enjoying the last two weeks of vacation with family and friends, at parties or at home, the Massachusetts men's track team was hard at work preparing for their two meets held over winter break. The Maroon and White emerged with two solid performances against several very strong teams.

On Jan. 19, the Minutemen made the trek across the Mass Pike to participate in the New England Challenge Cup along with five other quality squads from the Northeast (UConn, Brown, Rhode Island, Boston College, and Providence). UMass finished the day with fifty points, good enough for a tie with Boston College for fifth place. The performance was nothing to hang their head at, however, as the Minutemen were facing some of the toughest competition of the season. The Huskies finished the day well ahead of the pack with 184 points.

The meet was highlighted by a second place finish by senior Hugh Reid in the 500-meters with a time of just over 1:05. Freshman Jeff Jason continued his strong performance in the shot put, finishing solidly in second place with a throw of just under 51'.

Other Minutemen standouts included senior Mike Harris, whose two fifth place finishes in the 200-meter and 55-meter dashes. The 400-meter dash saw two other Maroon and White runners shine as Marc Sylander and Mike Howell finished in third and fourth place, respectively.

This past Saturday, the Minutemen traveled northward to take on UNH and Holy Cross. UMass took second place on the day, finishing with 128 points, just barely behind the Huskies. The team fared extremely well in distance events, earning several first-place finishes.

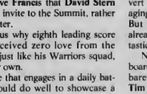
The Maroon and White's performance was highlighted by a dominating outing in the 500-meters, in which UMass swept the top three places. Andrew Nowicki led the charge with an impressive time of just over 1:09, followed closely by his compatriots Doug Gush and Gary Collups.

Brian Cronin triumphed in the 800-meter dash, clocking in with a time of just over 2:00, and the UMass relay team picked up another distance victory in the 4x800-meter dash.

The Minutemen picked up two more first-place finishes on the day as Harris continued to run well in a 55-meter dash win, and sophomore Reggie Oden picked up UMass' initial first-place finish on the campaign in the jumping events, taking the triple jump with a distance of just over 45'.

The Maroon and White continue on the road to the Atlantic 10 championships as they travel to Kingston, R.I. to take on host URI as well as Brown and once UNH once again.

Western Confernce has logjam at power forward, Nowitzki snubbed



MATTHEW E. SACCO

The National Basketball Association announced the reserves for the 2001 All Star Game in Washington, D.C. there are quite a few glaring omissions, especially out west.

Put an asterisk next to David Robinson's name that reads: "Dirk Nowitzki was unable to attend."

Somebody tell Steve Francis that David Stern addressed his All-Star invite to the Summit, rather than the Compaq Center.

I guess it is obvious why eighth leading score Antawn Jamison received zero love from the coaches, because he, just like his Warriors squad, are in a league of their own.

The NBA, a league that engages in a daily battle for credibility, would do well to showcase a seven-foot power forward who's smooth jump shot can be outdone only by his surfer boy doo.

I guess it would be bad press for someone to reach out and touch a guy who put up 51 points on two consecutive nights.

The league would also invoke some positive vibes into the annual oop-fest by inviting a pint size, point guard with a 48-inch vert who consistently keeps an aging Houston team in games. But then again the league has already anointed its poster boy leaper in the fantastic Vince Carter.

Nowitzki, who averages over 21 points and 9 boards, was handed the shaft by the admiral who barely manages to drop 14 while playing along Tim Duncan.

Francis on the other hand nets nearly 20 a contest, but instead of marketing the point guard of the future, they instead put the mouth, pardon, the glove on center stage.

Jamison could be the most deserving of the three. Not only did he make Kobe his hand puppet as he dropped a half dollar on the Lakers, he gives opponents of the Warriors someone to actually key on.

The majority of the Western Conference All Star roster is deserving, and if the Eastern Conference didn't exist then we wouldn't have this problem of bad players in the All Star game.

The original Alabama slammer, Antonio McDyess, is making his first All Star appearance representing the resurgent Denver Nuggets.

Karl Malone will have to interrupt his vacation to join his fraternity of power forwards in Rasheed Wallace and Kevin Garnett.

High flying, lane slashing Michael Finley is establishing himself as a regular at the annual event, as he will make his second straight All Star appearance.

Gary Payton will ironically round out the list of reserves, despite his reservations about Jason Kidd starting in his place.

Joining the Phoenix pass-master in the starting lineup is M.V.P. candidate Chris Webber. Duncan and Jason buddies Shaquille O'Neal and Kobe Bryant. The question remains however: What language will Kobe use to say "I need more touches?"

Comb the plains of tomorrow's back page for the Eastern Conference All Stars.

UMass turns up heat in Philly

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA – It seemed fitting somehow for a basketball game of this magnitude to be decided in four and a half seconds of action. For a battle fought so valiantly by both sides to come down to a foul shot rimming out and a whistle remaining silent between a referee's teeth.

That is precisely the scenario that unfolded Saturday afternoon at Temple's Liacouras Center, when the Massachusetts men's basketball team stunned the Owls of Temple 65-64 in overtime. UMass' Kiwana Rhymer laid in a Monty Mack feed to give his team the lead with 26 ticks remaining, and the margin stood up when Temple's David Hawkins missed the second of two free throws with 4.4 seconds on the clock.

Hawkins somehow pulled his own rebound out of the ensuing melee, but couldn't get off a shot as he was swarmed by three UMass defenders. Despite vehement protest by both the Owl players and head coach John Chaney, no foul was called and the final buzzer sounded.

"That was the worst foul of the whole game," Chaney said. "David was just knocked to the floor. They took his legs out from under him; they came right down on his arms with no ball at all. Policemen don't beat a guy that badly."

Mack finished with 20 points to lead all scorers, while Rhymer racked up 14 points and 11 rebounds for his third double-double in four games. The win left the Minutemen with a 6-1 record in the Atlantic 10 (18-10 overall) and a tie for first place in the conference with St. Joseph's.

The team has now won four straight and six of seven after managing only one victory in its first seven games.

"This one should let people know that UMass is back," Mack said. "We're the kind of team that takes something from every game and carries it over, and what we got from this one is that we can beat anybody."

The senior guard gave UMass a shot at victory in regulation, as he was fouled by Temple's Quincy Wadley on a perimeter jumper and converted both free throws for a 55-55 Maroon and White lead with 33.6 seconds left. But Owl Alex Wesby (10 points) banked home a second-chance layup with under 10 seconds left to lock the game at 55-all.

The Minutemen missed a chance to steal the win when Shannon Crooks' lane runner and three subsequent tips on their final possession of regulation wouldn't fall.

Junior guard Lynn Greer led the Owls with 16 points, seven of which he earned at the charity stripe. Hawkins and junior forward Kevin Lyde contributed 13 points apiece for Temple.

UMass head coach James "Bruiser" Flint said that his team's key defensively was stopping Wadley. The senior swingman had averaged 14 points per game during the Owls' three defeats of the Minutemen last year.

"Last year, it wasn't [Mark] Karcher or Greer or Lyde who killed us; it was Quincy Wadley," Flint said. "I told Monty, 'You'd better step up, my man.' I thought he did a good job of guarding him today."

Wadley finished with 10 points, but had only five points on 1-of-5 shooting from the field at the end of regulation. He had averaged over 17 points per game since the onset of A-10 conference play.

The game, televised nationally as part of ESPN's "Rivalry Week" and viewed live by over 7,000 fans at the Liacouras, was an emotional seesaw affair of 15 lead changes and countless clutch shots. Temple built an early four-point edge (11-7) on the bruising inside play of Lyde, whom Rhymer simply couldn't contain one-on-one.

"Lyde was kicking [Rhymer's] butt in the first half," Flint said.

UMass wrestled back the lead thanks to the three-point sniper fire of Mack and senior point guard Jonathan DePina (a combined 4-of-8 from down-

Monty Mack led UMass to its first-ever victory at the Liacouras Center Saturday in a 65-64 triumph over bitter rival Temple. Earlier in the week the Minutemen also downed LaSalle.

Minutemen dominating Atlantic 10 after lackluster non-conference play

JESSE GREENSPAN

It is official. The Massachusetts men's basketball team is actually playing well.

Even after UMass dominated George Washington in the second half on its way to a 76-60 win and even after it shocked Xavier on its home floor, the doubters were still there. People were still hesitant to say the Minutemen were a solid team after they pounded out a five-point win at home against Dayton and then lit up Duquesne two days later in Springfield.

But now, after traveling down to Philadelphia and sweeping a pair of games from A-10 rivals Temple and LaSalle, even the most negative of fans can say that the Maroon and White is doing everything in its power to climb back into the postseason hunt. UMass might have dug itself an early grave by getting off to a 2-9 start, but it is doing its best to scratch and crawl its way out of the ground and back onto the national scene.

The Minutemen might still stand at only 8-10, but over the last month they have managed to stake out a share of first place in the conference by being one last second three-pointer away from a perfect 7-0 A-10 record. And despite the fact that Vidal Massiah (the culprit of the shot that beat the Maroon and White) and the rest of St. Bonaventure ended up besting Amherst's most renowned hoops team on January 13, this past weekend's one-point overtime win over the Temple Owls showed that UMass is capable of beating anyone in conference play, and that it will be a very feared team once the A-10 tournament comes around in March.

The well-played battle between the Owls and Minutemen also allowed Massachusetts to gain some measure of revenge for last year's three drubbings that it took at the hands of Temple.

"If I'm not mistaken, before last year it was all even," head coach James "Bruiser" Flint said. "But they beat us three times last year, pretty bad. It's rivals week on ESPN, so I guess this is a rivalry."

Not only did the game allow the Minutemen to enact revenge, however, but it was also a great indication of how far the team has come since the beginning of the year. Anyone who watched the Maroon and White's debacles against such teams as Marquette and Holy Cross, realized that it really was a different team out there against the Owls. The team that played Temple minimized its turnovers, hit some clutch free throws (although Jameel Pugh did miss two freebies that could have iced the game for his team), and most importantly, did not seem afraid to win.

With UMass playing well and with Temple displaying the smoothness and stability always found on a John Chaney coached ball club, it made for a game that was quite more enjoyable to watch than some of the early season brick-fests.

"This was as good a game as I've been involved in," Flint said. "As a fan, you really had to enjoy the game today."

With the win, UMass moved into a first place tie with St. Joseph's for the Minutewomen capture two tri-meet triumphs

By Mathew F. Sacco

After reeling off five straight wins to start the season, the good ship Massachusetts was thrown off course by tropical storms "Syracuse" and "Connecticut."

Despite the coupled setbacks, the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team stayed the course and navigated it's way to two consecutive tri-meet wins and a well contested defeat at the hands of regional powerhouse Rutgers.

The first stop on the Maroon and White's winter voyage was south-southeast to Kingston, RI for a skirmish with the Rams and fellow conference rival, La Salle.

The Minutewomen were a factor in nearly every event, as the outcome of the meet was never in question.

Junior Anne Dettloff led the Maroon and White with three first place finishes, winning the 200, 500 and 1,000 free. Sandwich native Becky Hunnewell came away victorious in the 100 and 200 back.

Christen Dexter continued her outstanding rookie season by taking first in the 100 breast and the 200 breast. The freshman nearly broke her own school record in the 200, coming in at 2:22.20.

The underclassmen continued to impress as freshman Lauren Rowell won the 200 individual medley and sophomore Molly Buckley won the 50 free.

UMass went on to sweep the relay events, cementing a victory in the three-team meet. The Minutewomen amassed 429 points dwarfing the competition as LaSalle (242) and URI (191) could not even muster a challenge.

The next target for the Maroon and White was the port city of Baltimore, Maryland, where it would be met with strong resistance from the Colonials and the Retrievers.

UMass dominated the tri-meet, defeating George Washington 164-134, and Maryland-Baltimore County 166-132.

In the previous meet in Rhode Island, Dexter was less than a second away from breaking her previous mark in the 200 breast. In Baltimore the freshman came through, shattering her old school record with the swift time of 2:21.79.

Andrea Kazanjian was the victor in both the 50 and 100 free while junior Dettloff completed the UMass sweep in the freestyle by taking the 200. Kate Allery won the three-meter diving competition with a score of 250.15.

The Minutewomen proved once again that they are an especially tough team to beat when it comes to the relays. The killer "B's" of the sophomore class, Lizzy Boyle, Molly Buckley and Lauren Bulkeley teamed with Dettloff to take the 200 free relay, while freshman Lauren Rowell teamed up with Dettloff, Kazanjian and Dexter to win the 200 medley relay.

The relay events once again served as a cementing factor in another Maroon and White victory.

UMass concluded it's long winter journey on Senior Day in Amherst. The Minutewomen took on the title of underdog as the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers galloped into the Rogers pool on the final weekend of winter session.

Although the Maroon and White went into the meet as underdogs, its performance on Senior Day was gutsy and impressive. Rutgers barely escaped Amherst with a victory.

Coyner nets 1000th in win

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team took the hardwood this past Sunday looking to end a two game losing streak against last place Fordham. The Rams entered the Mullins Center looking for their first-ever win in the Pioneer Valley, which, to the dismay of the visitors, was nowhere to be found.

In what was a solid game for the Minutewomen, UMass was able to control the tempo of the contest early and do what it wanted to when it wanted to, and the result was a much needed 71-54 win. The win, which notched up the Maroon and White's Atlantic 10 record at 4-4 (9-10 overall), ties UMass in sixth place in the A-10 with Dayton.

The highlight of the afternoon for many of the Mullins Center patrons may not have been the win itself, but the event that occurred with 1:44 left in the UMass win. Senior point guard and team captain Kathy Coyner was fouled and was sent to the charity stripe. By hitting both of her two freebies, Coyner notched her 1,000-career point as a Minutewomen. Coyner posted 10 points and seven assists on the afternoon.

"I'll take a victory any day over this kind of thing," Coyner said. "It's a milestone, and I'm glad I did it. We played a good game today, we played with a lot of emotion and this just added to that."

Coyner hit the first shot of the game, a trey, and UMass never relinquished the lead. A couple of charity shots by Ebony Pegues gave the Minutewomen a 14-point lead with 7:33 left in the first half, but the Rams never packed it in. Fordham cut the lead to 11 points entering halftime, and was able to slice that down to an eight-point deficit early in the second frame, but that was as close as the Rams could come. An Amber Sneer bomb from behind the arc put the Minutewomen up by 17 with 6:26 left in the game, and Fordham would eventually go home with a 17-point loss.

UMass featured double-digit scoring from five players, most notably, sophomore center Jen Butler. Butler put up 14 points while amassing 22 rebounds for her eighth double-double of the season.

"She [Jen] was phenomenal," head coach Joanie O'Brien said. "When you come out and get 14 defensive rebounds, I don't care who you're playing, that's some effort. Twenty-two rebounds is almost ridiculous."

Sophomores Siiri Liivandi and Pegues each scored 11 points for the Minutewomen while Coyner and freshman Paige Harris each scored 10 points on the afternoon.

Solid point distribution was a major factor for UMass in its 17-point win.

"Today was big for us to get five people in double figures," O'Brien said. "That's something we would love to have every game, and hopefully we can continue to do that more and more."

Chelsea Keegan led the Rams with 18 points in its loss. Fordham (4-15, 1-7 A-10) will the host the Minutewomen in a rematch on Feb. 8th.

UMass entered the Fordham match-up on a two game slide. George Washington came to the Pioneer Valley and crushed the Minutewomen with a 28-point loss on Jan. 21. Two days later, LaSalle visited Amherst and delivered a 23-point heart-wrenching loss to the Maroon and White. UMass only featured one player in double digits scoring in each of the losses (Coyner and Harris) and shot less than 36 percent in both contests.

UMass shot 39.3 against Fordham, while the Rams shot 36 percent.

"This was huge," O'Brien said. "We had a tough weekend last weekend. We had our heads handed to us in two games where we came out flat. We did a pretty good job today. We had some spurts where we played some really good basketball, and it was the first time in a while we really went out and attacked people. This was one we had to have."

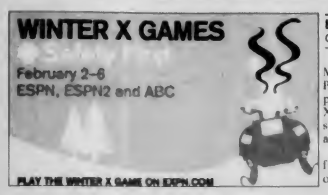
Students go to marketing X-tremes



By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

Students from the University of Massachusetts Sport Management Program have been selected to participate in the marketing of the 2001 Winter X Games being held at Mount Snow in southern Vermont for the second year in a row.

The Winter X Games will be held from Feb. 1 to Feb. 4 and will feature over 350 international athletes within the disciplines of snowboarding, skiing, snowmobiling and the new Moto X Big Air event.

The students enrolled in the class, titled eXalt Marketing Associates, have been taken out of the classroom and placed in the middle of the world's second largest winter sporting event, sponsored by ESPN and Mount Snow. EXalt Associates is a grassroots marketing force responsible for promoting the event to other college students by visiting local bars, ski clubs and other areas to give people as much information about the Winter X Games as possible.

The class is broken up in to four different segments, each of which is responsible for marketing to different regions in the Northeast. The groups have marketed the Winter X Games to over 65 colleges within a three-hour radius of Mount Snow and have used combinations of campus visits, bar promotions, ski shop promotions and extreme film viewing to promote the 2001 Winter X Games.

"EXalt students not only were instrumental in the marketing and promotions of the games in college and grassroots promotions, but they were also instrumental in the operations and competition organization aspects of the event. With their help we are looking forward to our most successful X Games to date," said Jason Naumoff, Marketing and Communications Manager for ESPN Winter X Games. "These guys really were super stars."

UMass lends 300k to save local theater

Melissa Shattuck
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Cinema Board received a $300,000 loan from the University of Massachusetts Foundation. The money from this loan is going to be used to turn the old Amherst Cinema building into a cultural arts center.

The idea for this project was thought up by a group of Amherst residents who did not want this available space to turn into another club or bar. These citizens felt as though the center of Amherst created more of a Friday night atmosphere and wanted to have something centrally located that would appeal to all residents.

"When the building was not showing movies residents started developing ideas that would be appealing to all Amherst residents and to create more of a balance in town," said Meg Gage, co-chair of the Amherst Cinema Board.

The residents then decided to establish a partnership with the New World Theatre. The New World Theatre is a university based theatre company who works closely with the Fine Arts Center. Since the closing of the Hamden Theatre, the New World Theatre has been without a place to call home.

"We've developed a partnership with the Amherst Cinema committee to try to put a cultural center in the middle of town," said Jose Tolson, Managing Director.

So how exactly is this happening? The Amherst Cinema Board has raised $300,000 from the town. The money that they have raised so far has been spent on studies and the actual purchase of the building. They have then borrowed $500,000. Three hundred thousand dollars of this has been borrowed from the UMass foundation, and the remaining $200,000 has been borrowed from a foundation in Northampton.

"Right now we're in a little bit of a quiet phase," Gage said. "We've had 45 days to buy the building and have just met the deadline."

Currently the Amherst Cinema Board is trying to reach their fundraising goal of $6.5 million. They are applying to numerous foundations, the state, and individuals for large and small donations.

SHALINI MARTI/COLLEGIAN

Left for dead, the Amherst Cinema Board is attempting to revive the Amherst Cinema with the support of UMass.

The cultural center will directly benefit both Amherst residents, and members of the UMass community. A cultural center in the middle of town will provide a variety of opportunities for everyone and give people different types of actives to enjoy in Amherst. With the New World Theatre being a permanent part of the cultural center, Tolson feels as though "everything that is done at the center will felt positively reflect on the University as a system.

Provost passed over for Iowa State position

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Provost Cora Marrett won't be President Marrett anytime soon. Chancellor Marrett is still a possibility.

Marrett was a finalist in the Iowa State University President search.

The Iowa Board of Regents announced last week that Gregory L. Geoffory, a senior administrator from the University of Maryland, got the nod.

There is still no word from the President's Office on any interim Chancellor for the Amherst campus. However, Marrett is considered a prime candidate, at least by the academic deans.

The Campus Chronicle reported that the Deans sent a letter to the President's office, endorsing the current Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs as interim Chancellor.

The President's office was unavailable for comment, as was Provost Marrett. Many academic deans were also unavailable.

At this point, it is still conjecture to consider Marrett the heir apparent. However, if the academic deans are "urging" the President William Bulger, it is quite likely that the President's office will review Marrett's Iowa State interviews.

Marrett met with the Ames campus of ISU on January 17th, at an open forum. Marrett was peppered with questions on a variety of issues including outreach, diversity and faculty concerns.

University Relations at Iowa State issued a press release summing up Marrett's visit.

"I have regarded what we call 'community service learning' as the honorable heir to the earlier land-grant tradition," Marrett told the crowd. "At the same time that I support that, I support also the strength of the learning part. I don't think it's useful just to have people going out doing random activities."

Marrett also described her feelings on what makes a good faculty.

"I don't measure scholarship by the number of publications or the size of grants. I measure it by the quality of ideas," Marrett explained. "Sometimes, if one is in a field where the advancement of ideas is often recognized by others through the support of the research grants that they get, then I expect that to be another validation of those ideas. It can't just be a numerical count of publications. I especially get disturbed when I see a list of publications when I can never figure out what's the unifying theme."

Marrett herself has an impressive list of publications. Her curriculum vitae lists thirty six articles, essays and books. Her unifying theme seems to be social issues concerning minorities and women.

Marrett has received at least $750,000 in grant money, and urges other faculty to search for the same.

SGA funds spring concert

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Without the presence of a Student Government Association Senate, seven individuals have been forced to make all decisions directly affecting the student body.

Appointed members of the SGA's coordinating council have been acting in a special term since the end of last semester. Last night was the second official meeting of the winter session to make quorum. However, problems arose when two members of the coordinating council, Agnes Caprone and Lianell James, decided to vacate their seats on the council yesterday afternoon, thus leaving only five out of the seven members active.

This was the second scheduled meeting of the week, as quorum was not meet for this past Tuesdays meeting. Finally, with quorum met, the coordinating council was able to be back to business once again. Financial issues became the headliner of the night as several RSO's as well as student- run businesses came looking for financial support.

This year's Spring Concert has been faced with financial issues, as a notable $20,000 has, as Former Senator and Chair of University Productions and Concerts (UPC) Finance Jeff Bazydlo said, "has fallen between the cracks," in the past two years. The missing money has left people scrambling. UPC and the SGA, the two major event coordinators, have faced a gap as well as complications in the formation of this year's budget.

Bazydlo came before the coordinating council requesting a $10,000 grant for Spring Concert funding.

"I don't want to have to cut an act because we don't have funding," Bazydlo said. "I really want to be able to pull this concert out of debt and still keep up the popularity of the acts up."

The coordinating council granted them funding in a unanimous vote. Three other student groups received funding in addition to UPC. La Casa de la Dominica was granted $2,000 dollars to fund its spring concert. Other groups to receive funding were the University of Massachusetts Chess Club and the student run Sylvan Snack Bar.

The Sylvan Snack Bar, which was broken into last semester, requested funding for damages as well as for its student payroll. It stressed the need for the payroll funding as employees were forced to take care of the mess as well as after planning.

"I agreed with the funding of all four of the groups, but I was hesitant in giving the student run business money for payroll ," said Mike Taugher, Coordinating council member and Chair of Ways and Means. "Paying $600 for student payroll was something I was personally uncomfortable with."

Despite differences between members of the council, a debate settled the issue and all parties agreed that the funding was what was really important. The Sylvan Snack Bar received the requested $1,109.76, and will be reopening Monday Feb. 6.

Although funding was allocated, members of the council expressed a genuine concern over the fact that only three people were giving out funds, rather than a Senate.

"I think overall it went well, but having two members drop out of the seven, when we should have a Senate is hard," House Speaker Jim Eltringham said. "I don't like making decisions with only three people present."

Taugher also expressed concern over the allocation of funds in last night's meeting. He expressed a general concern over the legalities of the council's ability to allocate funding to RSO's and student run organizations on campus.

"I'm not convinced that we have the ability to allocate funds to these groups, but Gabe [Chief Justice, Gabriel Tavares] has allowed it to happen," Taugher said. "I am glad that we had the ability to give funding to these groups, but the fact that three people allocated over $13,000 dollars when we normally would be done by a Senate of 80 people was a little uncomfortable."

With members hoping this to be the last meeting of the coordinating council, another meeting was set for Monday, Feb. 6.

"Although I was a little uncomfortable with tonight's events, the bottom line is that people got funding besides our internal struggle," Eltringham said. "We have two more motions up next week that I know of, but hopefully we'll be able to hold off until we have a real Senate once again."

EXalt Marketing Associates will try to build on the success of last year's class under the administration of Dr. Mark McDonald. Students in the class already demonstrated the new Winter X Games video game on Playstation II to the 45,000 people in attendance at the Boston Snow Exposition and they plan to get involved in the alternative music scene in the New England area.

Mount Snow Winter X Games Coordinator Mike Potter commended the group's efforts.

"Just by being here they have helped the Winter X Games. They are a force to be reckoned with," he said.

McDonald is pleased with the amount of responsibility and opportunities his class is being given.

"By working with ESPN and Mount Snow to help promote and manage the ESPN Winter X Games, the undergraduate students gain valuable experience which is very marketable to future employers," he said. "Students from last year's class have gone on work with companies such as the WNBA, the San Jose Quakes, Octagon and SFX Entertainment."

According to Potter, "to be on the inside of the Winter X Games is a learning experience in itself" because the students will be working on one of the biggest winter sporting events in the world.

Former UMass student and current Event Manager for Mount Snow Mark Miville praised the students and the sport management program at the University.

"The EXalt Marketing Associates team has proven to be a huge asset to Mount Snow and the ESPN Winter X Games. Judging from last year's success, this class allows students to gain hands on experience in grassroots marketing, add to their resume and make incredible contacts in the winter sports industry," he said. "As an Alumnus of the Sport Management program, I couldn't be happier with UMass' dedication to applied management courses."

Universities pledge for equal faculty

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

Nine universities, including the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard, agreed that women faculty were in an unequal position and decided on goals to alleviate the situation.

In addition to Harvard and MIT, Yale, Stanford, Princeton, the University of Pennsylvania, the University of Michigan, the University of California and the California Institute of Technology all took part in the conference, which declared the problem and then set broad, nonspecific goals to overcome them.

"We recognize that barriers still exist to the full participation of women in science and engineering," the statement signed by all six schools said.

To resolve the barriers, the universities pledged to seek greater diversity amongst its faculty, to strive for the equity of women in the faculty and to facilitate greater ease for female faculty members with children.

"To me, the goal is to make opportunity for every talented person without prejudice or bias, and that's the thing we have not really done for women yet," said Harvard provost Harvey V. Fineberg in an interview with the Boston Globe after the conference, which was conducted Monday at MIT.

The first step in the rectification of the problems isolated by the conference is research on the diversity of the student body of the various campuses, which would be made available to all members of the conference.

Women will be an integral part of rectifying any pay and promotional disparity amongst the sexes, as a periodic inquiry into these matters is to be conducted at every university. Senior woman members of the faculty are to be included in all levels of this periodic survey.

"One of the things that was heartening to me was the recognition on the part of top universities that this is not a one shot deal, it's a long-term problem that requires continual monitoring," said Barbara J. Grosz, a professor of computer science at Harvard, told the New York Times.

The issue of gender discrimination at colleges has been a major issue since thrust into the spotlight in 1997, when five woman professors filed a lawsuit against the University of Washington alleging that they were paid less and promoted less frequently than their male colleagues. That case has since been expanded into a class-action lawsuit involving almost 1,000 women professors with a trial date in 2002.

The University of Massachusetts released a similar statement in 1997, when Chancellor David Scott, in addressing the Faculty Senate, acknowledged the problem and pledged to correct it.

"I have at many times encouraged my colleagues to go out and get some funding," Marrett said. "There are resources out there. I expect they'll be able to do it. Whatever we undertake, we should undertake because we are going to do it and do it extremely well."

As of December of 1999, Marrett took home a salary of $162,223.88. If she becomes interim Chancellor, she won't have to worry about a pay cut. The President's office, after reviewing several other national averages for top level public college administrators, raised Chancellor Scott's salary increase to $220,000 a year from $160,000.

The new Chancellor salary is $3,000 less than the national average.

How to survive the Berlinale festival

Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Whatever happens, don't page Bond, James Bond at this year's Berlinale Film Festival, because more than one dashing secret agent could come running.

The 51st annual festival is highly regarded in Europe, usually placed below Cannes and on par with its peer in Venice. Fifteen feature films will be premiering at the event which begins on February 7th and many of Hollywood's best and brightest will be on hand supporting there own releases.

However, if anyone is thinking of attending the film spectacle there are a few things for any average traveler to remember.

First, be very cautious that nobody steals your face, as Sir Anthony Hopkins will be there to reprise his role as the insanely twisted Dr. Lecter in the highly anticlpated sequel to Silence of the Lambs.

Hannibal, which stars the aforementioned Hopkins and Julianne Moore as Clarice Starling, will make its worldwide premiere at the festival.

Second, if you notice a lot of winking and nodding going on, it's not just you; it is the fraternity of double-0 agents attending the festival.

Former Bond Sean Connery is in attendance to bolster his new flick, Finding Forrester. Connery acts as a mentor to newcomer Rob Brown who plays an aspiring writer in the movie.

Present Bond, Pierce Brosnan is in Berlin to back up his latest picture, Tailor of Panama. Based on a novel by John Le Carre, the spy movie will make its world premiere.

Lastly, don't be around when Kate Winslet goes on a harbor cruise for the first time since 1997, unless you are prepared to jump ship.

The Titanic actress will appear in the upcoming movie Quills.

There are over 20 films competing for the title of best picture at the annual festival in Germany, including some not anticipated titles with a cast of little known Actors.

Italian film is represented by the obsessive romance Malena about a love struck young boy. Joining the Italian entry in the foreign film department is the Algerian-Sengalese movie, Little Senegal. The picture is about an immigrant, from the African nation of Senegal, who ventures to the United States in search of distant relatives.

Steven Soderbergh's Traffic represents one of the better-known entries at the festival. The film, starring Michael Douglas, garnered mixed press but was received fairly well in the box office since release in the United States.

A movie that is receiving more buzz everyday is the World War II picture Enemy at the Gates. The setting is the Battle of Stalingrad, widely known as one of the bloodiest battles of the entire war. Rather than take the bird's eye view of the conflict, the film pits a Russian and a German sniper against each other in a battle that proved to be a turning point in the war.

The project was a joint venture between Germany and the U.S. and it represents one of the most expensive films ever filmed on German soil.

To top off the festival, Kirk Douglas will receive the coveted "Golden Bear" for lifetime achievement. Douglas acted in many unforgettable roles throughout his movie career. From Doc Holiday to Spartacus, Douglas is an accomplished and respected actor who reminds us that there is only one Spartacus, and only one Kirk Douglas.

Anyone interested in writing news must attend the mandatory meeting tonight at 6:00P.M. in the Collegian Office.

Topics of discussion will include; payroll, news beats, and a weekly meeting. If you cannot attend or have any questions call Adam, Ryan or Catherine at 545-1809.

At least 20,000 dead in India so far

Relief teams attempt to help Gujarat

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

The death toll continues to rise as more bodies are discovered in the rubble left by an earthquake that rocked the Gujarat province in northwestern India last Friday.

The earthquake, measuring a 7.9 magnitude, devastated the province; not only wiping out the second most industrial region in the country, but also causing the death of from 7,000 to 20,000 people so far. Some officials predict the final tally to be upwards of 100,000. Tremors continue to shake the area.

Along with the death toll, the number of homeless people also continues to rise as an estimated 200,000 people are left without shelter or basic necessities.

Relief efforts have shifted from the search for survivors to the unearthing of bodies. Rescue teams used special sniffing-dogs and seismographs in their rounds of searching.

While the rescue teams have begun to pack up, the Red Cross and other international agencies have begun their attempt to help the injured and hungry.

Aid from many countries has begun to flow into the area, but a lot of the supplies have had trouble getting to the victims as many of the depots and airports have been destroyed or damaged. There is a severe shortage of transportation as well as many passages blocked by rubble.

The situation gets worse as the relief trucks that do make it into ravaged areas are being hijacked. There are also widespread reports of looting. Five hundred bags of grain were reportedly stolen from a warehouse already.

A flight from the United Nations World Food Program left Tuesday for Gujarat carrying 41 tons of supplies such as generators and health kits. Another flight is scheduled to leave today.

Neighboring Pakistan, which also felt the affects of the quake, has sent over a plane full of blankets and tents for the displaced Indians. The earthquake caused 12 deaths and flattened buildings in Pakistan.

However, there are still pockets within towns that haven't gotten any relief. "Outside Bhuj, the relief is only going to areas on the main road," said Usha Nath of Kutch Navnirman Abhiyan, in a report by Cnn.com. Kutch Navnirman Abhiyan is an Indian volunteer group that is trying to coordinate the distribution of emergency aid.

Meanwhile, thousands of people have begun to flee the area and are on their way to Delhi and Bombay by train and foot.

Even before all the sustenance can reach the starving people, something must be done to clear the wreckage of buildings and concrete. Many relief agencies have brought in bulldozers and cranes to start to clean up the area.

As the trucks begin the massive disposal project, all around them are thick flames of funeral pyres that burn through the night. As machinery turns over the chunks of wreckage, more bodies are discovered. Piles of wood have been set up along the roads for more funerals.

Yet more groups are rushing to assess the sick and try to prevent any outbreaks of disease. Medical supplies are in short supply and doctors have been forced to treat patients in the open air, as most hospitals were destroyed or at best, badly damaged.

Officials are calling this earthquake the worst in over 50 years and it has already caused up to $5.5 billion. Since the Gujarat is an important business region for the country, its destruction spells financial devastation as well for India. Not only will there be a huge cost in rebuilding, there will also be a huge cost in the loss of production time, and in the workforce.

The country is appealing to the international community for aid in supplies, volunteers, and especially monies to help finance the disaster relief.

Location of the earthquake.

Protecting the line between church and state

Is there nothing sacred in American politics? What was once a bare minimum of the American politic, the separation of church and the state, is now itself slowly fading into the probable past.

George W. Bush wants to make religion a large part of his presidency, and recently proposed offering massive tax cuts and tax breaks to so-called faith-based organizations. Obviously not a quiet or ignored issue, Bush has raised the ire of those who oppose any blurring of the line that separates churches and our state.

On the very surface of it, Bush has said that he isn't promoting religion with his tax cuts, but his consistent references to "the Lord" makes us wonder exactly which Lord he's talking about. If he has a specific one in mind, the slippery slope of wet grass has frozen over and snow is beginning to fall.

For if tax breaks are given to "faith-based" organizations, who will receive government funds next? Religious colleges? Religious churches? Will this nation accept the idea that national taxpayer funds are going directly into the coffers of some religions, while others are left in the cold?

It is impossible to presume that Bush could help all religions equally, and any favoritism forever kills any illusion of objectivity that the government could ever pretend to have towards religion. In fact, giving any money to religious groups can be seen as a total destruction of the church/state relationship.

In the same vein, the separation of church and state has been a dual protection: In addition to protecting the government from the encroachment of religion, it has protected the churches of the nation from the encroachment of government.

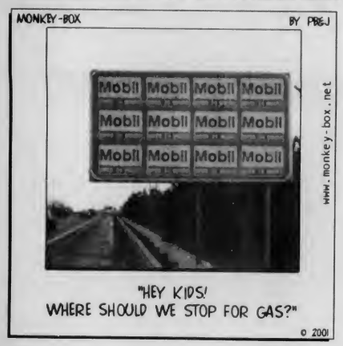
If the churches are being given all of this tax money as Bush suggests, those in power who control the purse strings will want a say as to where the money is going.

Once governments become involved in religion, who is to say where this involvement will lead? Do we really want our politicians to be in a position of authority over our clerics? Those chosen by God should not be subject to those chosen by the citizens of the nation. This plan opens a dangerous door, which could someday allow the government to expand its influence into an area that it should never be permitted to enter.

Even though the specifics of Bush's faith-based charity initiative have yet to be announced, leaving more basis for forming a concrete opinion to be revealed, the mere foundations of the plan are inherently troubling.

The barrier between church and state is one that should never be breached, no matter how noble the intent. It is too crucial both to the religious freedom of the American citizen and the governmental freedom of American churches to be crossed for any reason.

The Collegian stands by the view that this plan is too dangerous to ever be implemented, and we ask our elected leaders to do everything in their power to defeat it.



Follett's follies

LAURA SICILIANO

I used to love the first day of school when I was younger. New pens and pencils, fancy folders and binders, and back to school clothes. When I came to college, things were not nearly as exciting, but I always liked to get my new textbooks. You can call me a dork (I know I am), but I was always a little eager to see what books I was getting and if I was getting any good reading for the semester. Any enjoyment that came from getting new books disappeared on registration day, when the Textbook Annex proved once and for all how horrible it could be.

When all of the privatization uproar was spreading across campus a few years ago, I never cared that much about it. I thought privatization would mean better prices for us students. Now that Follett is in charge of the bookstore, I have been waiting to see all of the improvements it has been promising. It looks like I am going to be waiting for pigs to fly, because the Textbook Annex has not only not been improved, but it is worse than I have ever seen it before. Case in point: I arrived at the annex at about 2:45 p.m. I found one of my classes, where not surprisingly, only one of the three books was available. I went for the books in my next class and found what I thought was a used book, and in great condition. I thought it was used because it was unwrapped, and all but four of the other books were shrink-wrapped. I got in line to purchase my books at about 2:55 p.m.

The line was moving slowly, and as a lot of people were buying their books, a wait was to be expected. Over 40 minutes passed, and by that time I had already waited so long that I was not going to leave. As we crept toward the registers, the wait had reached an hour when I finally found out why there was a delay. For all 15 or so registers, only ONE credit card could be processed at a time. People with cash, checks or UCards could pay with no problem, but for the majority of the people waiting, the people who were planning to pay with credit cards, there was nothing else to do but wait.

I have worked in many places where credit cards are accepted. I understand that problems arise and that lines can be busy and people have to wait. However, in every place that I have worked, there were things that could be done to make things easier for customers. Cards could be swiped the old fashioned way on to paper or customers could be told that there was a delay before they started waiting. If I had known that I would have to wait an hour and forty minutes before I would be able to buy my books, simply because I was paying with a credit card, I would have gone home and come back another day.

Apparently, however, the big corporate money of Follett can not afford new registers with better credit card technology, or let its target customers (students) know when something is not working. The clerks and managers at the front of the line were very nice, but I shouldn't have to wait an hour and half to talk to someone to find out why the wait is so long. Clerks should have been informing the people at the back of the line that there were problems with the credit card machine and that a long wait should be expected.

When I finally got to a register a little before 4:30, I found out that the used book I had wasn't used at all; it was just arbitrarily unwrapped. The Post-It notes that I had picked up were not yet "in the system" and the fancy Follett computers apparently do not allow a clerk or manager just to type in $1.99 under miscellaneous. The clerk and manager, who were very nice, told me that I didn't want to wait while the Post-Its were put "into the system". I sure as heck did not want to wait another 40 minutes for that.

The store had tried to make up for the excessive wait in the incredibly warm store by offering candy at the registers. However, the chocolates were melting in the heat and I would have preferred a more efficient store over some free candy. Follett seems to think that it can cover up their store's shortcomings with candy, music and bright posters. It seems to be ignoring the fact that all students really care about is conveniently getting their books as inexpensively as possible. I guess, however, that Follett doesn't really have to worry about serving the students that well. It knows that as long as professors order its books from the store and students have to buy the books, we are going to keep on going there, no matter how ridiculous the wait or ancient the technology. That leaves us students between a rock and a hard place.

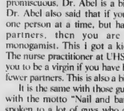
Promiscuity: more than just a number



EMILY VACANTI

As my first column for this, my last semester, I am going to stick to a topic which I am becoming well-known for in my group of friends, even though I'm very inexperienced: sexual activity. Within sexual activity, I am going to address an issue that everyone has a different opinion on, yet nobody seems willing to discuss: sexual promiscuity. My main interest in this subject is how everyone goes about defining promiscuity.

A few days ago, I was sitting around with some of my friends, and then a few days later I was sitting around with a few more of my friends. I brought up this topic with each group, hoping that they could help to clarify the issue.

At first, everyone was quite judgmental, saying that a certain number of partners can be considered promiscuous. Then two of my friends made a very good point. It's not only the number of partners that you have had, or your sexual promiscuity, but also how long you are with each person, how long you have known them, and how long you decide to wait.

I have a lot of friends who put a very specific time limit on sexual activity, like deciding to wait at least one month before they will dance the horizontal mambo. Some of my other friends take a much more realistic approach. They say that they will wait until they know that it's the right time. It is not that the idea of waiting a specific amount of time before engaging in sexual activity is something that I agree with, it is more that there are certain things that should not have a time limit, and sex is one of those. As many of you know, a given couple might feel as though they should wait a year or longer, while their best friends start after they have been together for a week. It all depends.

One of my friends waited until she knew her partner for two days. Many people judged her, including myself at one point. It was none of my business, though, so I backed off and got to know him. He's awesome: smart, nice, good-looking and funny. I see what she liked in him. I also know a couple that waited a year. I never questioned them. What this comparison showed me is how big an effect my parents had on me as they raised me. The only reason that my thinking has become more liberal is because of this school.

So let's return to the subject of defining promiscuity. Say you know someone that has slept with five people in ten years, and that they were with each person for two years. Do you consider that promiscuous? I do not. What I do consider promiscuous is sexual activity with multiple partners in a short period of time. This includes both men and women. Sorry, promiscuity does not discriminate. If you "hook up" with a different person every weekend and have sex with them, you are disgusting. You should not only be considered promiscuous and disgusting, but you should also go get tested.

One afternoon when I went to University Health Services, I randomly asked a nurse practitioner what she considered promiscuous. She regularly gets patients who are being tested for STI's (sexually transmitted infections). She then asks how many sexual partners the patient has. The average answer that she gets is between 10 and 15. She said that people say it so emotionlessly that she wants to shake some sense into them. Ten to fifteen partners is now considered average at UHS.

I by not to be judgmental, but I have to agree with her. All of these people who continuously have one-night stands cannot be considered anything but promiscuous.

In a lecture given by Dr. Abel, a promiscuous person was defined as having had four partners in her life. I completely disagree with this. As much as I agree with the thought of multiple partners in a short period of time being promiscuous, Dr. Abel is a bit extreme. Dr. Abel also said that if you are with one person at a time, but have several partners, then you are a serial monogamist. This I got a kick out of. The nurse practitioner at UHS considers you to be a virgin if you have had five or fewer partners. This is also a bit extreme.

It is the same with those guys who go with the motto "Nail and bail." I have spoken to a lot of guys who consider it normal to date a girl until she "puts out" and then leave her. Doing this time and time again also classifies you as promiscuous.

So, to summarize all of what I have just said, being classified as sexually promiscuous depends on a variety of different things. There is not one aspect of a person that can define them as promiscuous. Many people currently believe, and will continue to believe for a very long time, that the number of partners you have had is the sole aspect that defines a person as being promiscuous or not. These people, though they do mainly of an older generation, I do not honestly know what anybody from my grandparents' generation tends to think.

What I do know is that people from my age group tend to be very judgmental about this, with no particular reason other than they want a say in everyone else's lives. That is a reason why I have had a tendency to judge. I always want to give my opinion of everything. When it comes to judging people as to whether they are promiscuous or not, I am going to leave that up to them to decide. There are so many factors that define a person cannot be considered anything but promiscuous.

The Power and Class-less

SAM WILKINSON

It's not that they're manically obsessed with marching. That doesn't matter.

It's not that they refer to themselves as the "Power and Class of New England." That doesn't matter.

What does matter is that our Marching Band embarrassed this school on Inauguration Day. They marched for President Bush, our president who didn't technically "win" the election, or at least "win" enough for any of us to truly believe that he's our president. They saw the "honor" of marching for Bush and grabbed at it, ignoring the endorsement they gave the Texan as a result.

"The Power and Class of New England" marches for what claims to be one of the most liberal campuses in the entire United States and yet chose to march for a blazingly conservative President who won an election in which blacks were prevented from voting by all accounts, where ballots were confusing enough to necessitate that thousands were thrown out and, oh yeah, where the "winner" lost by more than half-a-million votes nationwide in what ended up being the third closest election of the last 40 years.

Instead of acknowledging any of that, instead of turning down the invitation to march in what would surely been a classy protest, the marching band instead chose to represent liberals as best they could: by totally selling out to Republicans.

Perhaps some don't see the march as an endorsement of Bush, but hey, they went, didn't they? They marched in front of him, didn't they? They didn't stop playing as they marched by, right? They didn't do anything to specifically not endorse our new President.

Oh sure, we all know that this campus was rabidly Nader because there seems to be a group of people on this campus that truly believes that giving every citizen a cute puppy is a solution to this nation's continued problems, but what did the marching band end up telling everyone out there? That the "Power and Class of New England" supports a man against affirmative action, against women's rights, against environmental rights, against rights period, and who is supportive enough of the death penalty to put it on Pay-Per-View if he could. Where was the UMass brain trust on this?

Where was student leadership...ah, a foolish question now that I think about it. But still, where was anybody with any sense at all? George Bush would happily cut funding to Universities other than Bob Jones in South Carolina given half a chance, and especially to universities like UMass, yet we puckered up with both lips out like a twelve-year-old's first kiss, ready to plant a big wet smooch on Bush's butt.

How embarrassing.

If Massachusetts wanted to send a marching band that accurately reflects the viewpoints of a conservative like Bush or our real president Dick Cheney, send the three piece, gold-plated Amherst College Marching Group. They're rich. They're conservative. They're probably jerks, although I'm sure that stereotype is radically unfair. Then again, it'll be those kids getting the benefits of Bush's inane tax cut, not any of the probably middle-class kids who march in our band, who wear the maroon and white of UMass.

Which is what is so frustrating. Near as anyone can tell, nobody in the band leadership voiced any objection to marching in a parade that was basically one small stroke in the giant national stroking of our new President. Nobody seemed to acknowledge the implication of the march. What was band director George Parks thinking?

What is it about liberals in this country – why have Republicans gotten ahead? Because they have the obnoxiousness to ante up when it's time to ante up. Democrats and most of the people who only voted for Nader because they fell for the conventional logic that Bush = Gore, despite obvious differences between the two, never stand up for themselves. Where were all those stupid Seattle protestors who can't, specifically, describe why the IMF is bad (it is bad, there's no denying, but can they explain it...) when blacks weren't allowed to vote? Where were all of those dirty hippies when votes were being thrown out? Why were there more Republicans down in Florida protesting for Bush than liberals protesting for Gore?

They were sitting around the bong, listening to the Grateful Dead talking about how much that puppy would have helped Americans, or readying themselves to march in Washington, willing to accept the status quo before being willing to oppose it.

It's sad that liberals are so weak and so pathetic, and it's sad that the UMass band buckled so briskly when asked to march before the big bad Bush. Someday, hopefully, liberals will get the backbone that they used to have, that Republicans now have, and that liberals are going to need if they're going to get power back from the right side of the spectrum.

Drugs and Youth on TV

With all of the youth-marketed television programming on these days, it's no wonder that these shows would eventually shift their gaze to the issues surrounding drugs. Of course, teen drug use has always been a particularly sensitive problem for the media, especially of late, concerning the connection of teens to ecstasy use. Contemporary youth-targeted shows have tried to capture these problems and realities of teen drug use recently, and almost all fall notably short from this goal.

In November, Dawson's Creek of the WB aired an episode concerning ecstasy use by high schoolers. The previews for the episode promised a gritty and somewhat realistic view of the media's target drug. The procurer of the drug was ex-bad girl Jen (a carry-over from her wild city days). But, it is Andie – the local teen with the most angst and emotional anguish – that ends up consuming the pill. And as one should only expect from such a show, what follows is a hokey, unrealistic and chastising treatment of a very real and sensitive issue. Dawson and the crew end up at a clean and very well lit "rave," full of preppy town kids, soft background music and a few glowstick necklaces. Andie, who is apparently the only raver on ecstasy, becomes a parody of someone on drugs and, finally ends up in the hospital. Predictably, the episode has a final "Say No to Drugs" message, and the feel of an hour-long public service announcement.

The WB's 7th Heaven also tackled the drug issue in a recent airing. However, as anyone who has watched this moral-touting show about a minister and his family must assume, this episode was even less gritty and less realistic than Dawson's. It didn't cover anything as weighty and controversial as ecstasy, but did touch upon marijuana use. Mary, the problem child of the family, associates with two of the local, teenage parent, drug using, high-school-flunk-out hoodlums. The episode involves peer pressure to lead Mary to an implied scene of smoking, though she is never actually seen using the drug. The message here seems to be even more of an obvious rant against drugs than Andie's hospital visit, if only due to the preaching nature of the show.

Third Crow film to show in Northampton

The Crow: Salvation may have been resigned to the status of straight-to-video, but fans of the franchise will have the chance to view the film on a big screen this weekend in Northampton. The film, distributed by Miramax and starring Eric Mabius (Welcome to the Dollhouse, Cruel Intentions) and Kirsten Dunst (The Virgin Suicides, Bring It On), had fared better than both previous Crow films with test audiences, but its graphic and unapologetic violence compelled Miramax to shy away from a wide release.

Mabius, in a recent conversation with The Collegian, attributed Miramax's choice to politics and "the climate of the market right now," saying that "violent films are just being lambasted and spearheaded by right-wing censorship groups."

Mabius described his experience making the movie as "most enjoyable," commenting on how satisfying an experience it was to work with such well-regarded actors as Dunst and Fred Ward.

The Crow: Salvation will show at the Academy of Music in Northampton, at 11:30 p.m. on Saturday, February 3. Tickets will be $10, and can be purchased at the Academy box office from 7 to 11 p.m. the night of the show. Mabius will introduce the movie, and following the film will conduct a question and answer session. More information on the film and Mabius can be found at http://members.aol.com/ericmabius.

Fatboy Slim's latest a mixed bag of beats

FATBOY SLIM
Halfway Between the Gutter and the Stars
Astralwerks

A friend of mine once paraphrased the enlightened Ben Gazzara on a certain breed of his Hollywood peers. Something like "actors nowadays, they're jogging, eating lowfat yogurt. These days, if you have a four o'clock scotch you're an alcoholic! These people want to live forever...so they can bore you forever." Has Norman Cook taken the same route?

Cook, a.k.a. Fatboy Slim, has trimmed the fat and filtered out most of the sweets from his previously bouncing, silly efforts, the bulk from his breakthrough 1998 album You've Come a Long Way Baby. Hits like "The Rockafeller Skank" and "Gangster Tripping," products of the style known as 'big beat,' were US club crazes thanks to their pounding bass and incessant, catchy, looped vocal samples. While much of this is looked back upon with embarrassment, none more critical than Cook himself, many seem to forget the craft and obvious musical knowledge that went into creating these big beat monsters. Juvenile as they may have been, classics like "Right Here Right Now" and "Praise You" were fully textured and multi-layered pieces of pop bliss, which leads one to wonder why Cook is so eager to slay the not-entirely-evil dragon he helped create.

With the goal of Halfway Between the Gutter and the Stars, Fatboy Slim's third proper album, being the creation of a more 'mature' sound, has Norman stopped having fun in an attempt to be taken more seriously and extend his lifespan on the music scene? Certainly not, as BPM-tastic tracks like "Ya Mama" and "Mad Flava" would have been very comfy on ...Baby. Unfortunately, there is nothing on Halfway, serious or fun, nearly as compelling as the best work on ...Baby, and nothing terribly compelling at all throughout the album, until the finale. The party tracks are serviceable, but unfocused efforts like "Star 69" and "Weapon of Choice" just flounder until the next song comes along and mercifully puts it out of its misery. The high-profile moments on the album, namely the first single "Sunset (Bird of Prey)" and the Macy Gray collaboration, are fine while they're playing.

Unfortunately, it seems unlikely that anyone will be begging the DJ to play them at a sweaty rave near you, with the playful "Lovelife" being the best of the bunch. One likely to be heard at clubs everywhere is the thrilling 12 minute closer "Song for Shelter," a sweaty dance music revival of sorts, complete with preacher and feeling of transcendence. With this track, Cook proves he has electronic music wired right down to the soul and is ready to move into uncharted and exciting territory, and we can hope Halfway is just a rough transition. (Michael Delano)

SICK OF IT ALL
Yours Truly
Fat Wreck Chords

Sick Of It All is probably the last band that needs to justify its honesty and integrity to the listener. When Lou screams "this is not a mission/ it's not a fucking game...this is not an image/ this is our lives!" on "Disco Sucks Fuck Everything," he's preaching to the converted. We know. "We" being the Sick Of It All faithful that buy the albums and the tickets. This sort of intro to the band may have been helpful to radio listeners if current 'rock' radio had the balls to play SOIA (they don't) or if the music didn't speak so loudly itself. With SOIA the medium is definitely the message.

I've come to take for granted that every new release from these godfathers of NYC hardcore will be a classic, and Yours Truly is no exception. Pete's got the riffs down in spades, "The Bland Within" and "Hands Tied Eyes Closed" being the best of the bunch. Simple and driving, the music addicts during the mid-nineties. The six-hour series is spread over six episodes and was aired in spring 2000 on HBO, a reliable spot for some of TV's most socially conscious programming.

The circular aspect of life on the corner leads its characters to drugs for a more bearable ride to nowhere. The core story details a once-successful family, now scraping the bottom for money, doing anything from selling stolen scrap metal to unsuccessfully stealing from thrift stores to make ends meet. The performances are amazing throughout, with sincere and sympathetic portraits created by actors and actresses whose characters deal with extraordinary circumstances in very real and flawed ways. Fran Boyd, played by Khandi Alexander, watches her husband become more and more helpless and her son increasingly and dangerously street-wise, and knows she has to detox and pull things together. Alexander's portrayal of Boyd often elicits tears and winces, but her amazing bounceback following a stay at a recovery center is the most forceful political statement the series makes, offering a very convincing push for treatment rather than flaccid attempts at law enforcement regulation of street drugs.

One of the series' greatest strengths is presenting in an extremely real way the struggle actual drug abusers face, so without pushing blatant political motives or trying too hard to give a first-person perspective, viewers experience a life that's not too far removed from their own. Having it all and losing it, the steep hill to redemption, and the guilt of success are universal themes that show with greater strength how drugs in society are seeped in too far and need to be understood before they are dealt with.

from the usual "Say No" message of television's teen fare; the drug use is not rare, and it is not subtle. During circular camera shots, the group of high school friends chats and laughs (a lot) with smoke billowing in the background. However, it isn't completely overt either. That is, they never explicitly say, "Hey, we're smoking pot" during the suspiciously smoky scenes (though one of the characters was busted for possession). It is taken for granted as a part of life for the bored, suburban-stranded teenagers. The message here isn't "Say No." There is no message in the show about drugs; it is an incidental part of the plot. Analogous to the movie Traffic, it acknowledges that young people who use drugs aren't all problem teens, hoodlums, and bad seeds, but can be so-called "normal" kids.

The show doesn't preach. After all, it is a comedy, but it also offers a gentle warning. One of the teens works at the town photo booth under the employment of the resident foolish character. He is a laughable burnout who, presumably, did too many drugs in his hippie heyday, and serves as a subtle warning to people who let drugs take over their life.

The mid-90s teen drama "My So Called Life" is the only other show in recent memory to take a more rounded view on the drug issue. It covered ecstasy use and marijuana use, as well as a host of other teen substance-abuse issues. But it too portrayed some drug users as the kid-next-door type, and the problem as not just an inner city issue, but as an issue for all families, universally. Unlike That 70's Show, however, the drama also brought to light the negative, and potentially fatal, aspects of using.

It is the television programs (and movies like Traffic) which admittedly show that there are gray areas to this problem that seem to be the most honest and effective portrayal of the problems and realities of youth and drugs. Stereotyping and condemning is most often the case, as it is seen as the morally responsible high road. A simple dismissal of the problem as "bad" is taking this youth reality as a black-and-white question, and even a goofy sitcom captures the reality of drugs as they are in this country more accurately than do most teen dramas.

Double Take suffers humor and decipherability bankruptcy

By Nicholas Pizzolato

DOUBLE TAKE directed by George Gallo with Orlando Jones and Eddie Griffin playing at Cinemark

There are some things that really hurt. Dropping a brick on you toe, that hurts. Burning your hand on a hot pan fresh from the oven equals pain. Tripping in front of Herter and twisting your ankle also creates pain beyond belief. And now I can add viewing the film Double Take as being one of the most painful experiences of my life. Despite the humorous attempts by two of the most popular comics today, there was no way for them to heal a script that was broken in so many places.

Oralndo Jones, recognized mostly for his portrayal of the 7Up spokesperson and the wide receiver in last year's comedy The Replacements, plays Daryl Chase, a Wall Street banker. Although we never know what job he actually holds, we know that he is rich and well educated (he speaks Italian to his Italian doorman and reminds us all that he went to Harvard). One day he is scammed by Freddy Tiffany (comedian Eddie Griffin). For the next twenty minutes Freddy keeps bumping into Daryl in the most unrealistic of ways. It doesn't make any sense how Freddy finds him or even gets into a high-class party in which Daryl is wining and dining a client. No explanation is ever given when Freddy turns up, and this is just one of the many annoying tendencies this movie follows.

When Daryl gets home with his girlfriend, two burglars attack him, but when Daryl screams out a gunman jumps into his room and takes down one of the assailants. This man is CIA agent T.J. McCready, and he tells Daryl that his life is in danger and gives him his card to call him if he needs anything. Ok, is it just me, or is this way too high-profile for a CIA operative? Yes I'm a secret agent, here's my card."

So Daryl ends up on the lam and once again up pops Freddy Tiffany and they switch identities, which ends up being the funniest part of the film: the upper class banker becomes the thug and the con man becomes the banker. We see Griffin getting hysterical, claiming that two police officers were about "to go Rodney King on his banking ass." Then Jones plays the same card when they are in the dining car and he asks the waiter for some Schlitz malt liquor with his dinner. This, unfortunately, is the funniest part of the movie, and the part that is shown in most of the trailers.

The rest of the film can't decide what it is. Is it an action/comedy? Or is it a cloak and dagger film? If it is an action/comedy It is the most confusing action/comedy I have ever seen. For those of you who thought Mission: Impossible was confusing, you will hate Double Take. The action/comedy genre is supposed to be fun and lighthearted. Films like Rush Hour and Money Talks are the perfect examples. They mix gun play, list fights, and fast talking lead characters to create a decent fun movie, a movie that won't win any awards, but which nonetheless is enjoyable to watch. Double Take obviously didn't study this formula well enough because it seemed to be just as confused as the people watching it.

Double Take is a terrible movie, atrocious, mind numbing and a total waste of film, or for that matter videotape. It's a shame, too, because I looked forward to seeing this film. I really enjoyed both Eddie Griffin and Orlando Jones in their early works and it's too bad that the film couldn't encompass their talents for comedy. It's the type of film that will never get better each time one sees it, unlike Blue Streak, which when I first saw it I hated it but now find enjoyable. This film will never reach that status. Don't see it now. Don't see it when it comes out on video. Don't see it when It's on network television. Just don't see this movie.

DUDE WHERE'S MY CAR
Directed by Danny Leiner with Ashton Kutcher, Seann William Scott, Kristy Swanson

Does a film have to be a well written, well acted, original, biting social commentary to be a good film? Nope, all it needs is a few good fellatio jokes. Well, not really, but just because a film has a plot that is both ridiculous and incredibly simple at the same time, and scrapes the bottom of the barrel when it comes to humor, it can still be entertaining. Dude, Where's My Car fits this criteria to a T. Sure, it isn't Shakespeare in the Park, but it's not as if it is trying to be. After all, the name of the film is Dude, Where's My Car – what do you expect?

A film like Dude, Where's My Car needs to meet a few standards to be considered a success. Mainly, it needs to provide a hefty serving of toilet humor, pot smoking jokes, ethnic stereotypes and sexual innuendo. After all, what else can one ask for in a film? Dude gives the viewer a hefty serving, then gives seconds, and thirds. A character whose only role is waking up, peeing into a houseplant and returning to sleep in a closet covers the area of toilet humor adequately. The sexual innuendo category is satisfied by a character whose name is Christie Boner (Kristy Swanson). Chinese people whose only role was serving up the pu-pu platter, and other foreigners made sure that ethnic stereotypes were well represented. And who could forget the pot smoking dog? We're talking some classy stuff in this film.

Due to the short attention span of the type of audience that sees a film called Dude, Where's My Car (and hey, I'm one of them) they waste no time getting the wheels of the main storyline moving. Within the first ten minutes the two stoners, Jesse (Ashton Kutcher of That 70's Show) and Chester (Seann William Scott, "Stifler" of American Pie fame) wake up and realize that they lost their car in their exploits the night before. Due to the high amounts of mind-altering substances they consumed, they can't recall the events of the previous night. To make matters worse, the anniversary gift they intended to give to their girlfriends was left in the car, ruining their chances at getting laid. With that our adventure begins.

Dude.

Even though the premise of the film is ridiculously simple, the story becomes weirder and more over the top as the film progresses to its raging climax. By the end of Jesse and Chester's odyssey to find their car, the dudes learn they possessed – and lost – a suitcase full of cash. They meet up with six female aliens in skin tight body suits who believe that Jesse and Chester know the whereabouts of something called an Intergalactic Transducer (ok, I forget the exact name of it) that has the power to end the universe as we know it. Because of this, they are caught in the middle of an intergalactic war, with the fate of the universe at stake. As Jesse or Chester would say, "Sweet, Dude." Somewhere around then the story becomes completely unrealistic and is treading water, about to become one of the most ludicrous movies ever made. However, the general insanity of the plot involving the aliens is so campy it's entertaining. The producers could have told a story that was intelligently written about two potheads retracing their steps from the night before and trying to find their car (anyone remember the episode of Seinfeld where they spent the entire show trying to figure out where they parked their car at the mall?). Instead, they decided nay on the intelligence, aye on the aliens, pot-smoking dog and Christie Boner.

One thing that Dude Where's My Car got right was the casting. Quite simply, Stiffler (sorry, but that is what he will be forever known as) and Jesse are weirder and more over the top than the film progresses to its raging climax. By the end of Jesse and Chester's odyssey to find their car, the dudes learn they possessed – and lost – a suitcase full of cash. They meet up with six female aliens in skin tight body suits who believe that Jesse and Chester know the whereabouts of something called an Intergalactic Transducer (ok, I forget the exact name of it) that has the power to end the universe as we know it. Because of this, they are caught in the middle of an intergalactic war, with the fate of the universe at stake. As Jesse or Chester would say, "Sweet, Dude." Somewhere around then the story becomes completely unrealistic and is treading water, about to become one of the most ludicrous movies ever made. However, the general insanity of the plot involving the aliens is so campy it's entertaining. The producers could have told a story that was intelligently written about two potheads retracing their steps from the night before and trying to find their car (anyone remember the episode of Seinfeld where they spent the entire show trying to figure out where they parked their car at the mall?). Instead, they decided nay on the intelligence, aye on the aliens, pot-smoking dog and Christie Boner.

Not surprisingly, this film was mostly hammered by critics and moviegoers alike. Scour the Internet for reviews and opinions on the film and the disdain is intense. It seems everyone has their own witticism to describe how much they loath this movie: "Dude I Want My six dollars back" or "Racism, sexism, and stereotypes.... Not sweet dude." Well, here is one critic that won't do that. That's right, I actually somewhat enjoyed Dude, Where's My Car. Sure, the story is lame, and it's one of those movies that I feel like if I was given the premise I could have actually written a comparable, or even better screenplay. With that said, the movie is still a good time, even if doing anything else would actually be a better use of time. Yes, the movie is stupid. Yes, the comedy is anything but intelligent. And yes, the movie is still a good time. Plus, Fabio makes a cameo. How can you argue with that?

is familiar territory, stripped-down and restrained for the hardcore crowd, but sure to contain plenty o' riff changes and variety for the metalheads. Hallmarks of SOIA albums are also present, like the under-a-minute hardcore blast (the 48-second "Broke Dick") and the emotional, slower-paced song ("Souvenir").

The lyrical content expands on Lou's digust for the current music and political scene that was honed to near perfection on 1998's Call to Arms. "Don't waste money that will speak for you/ It's the voice that speaks the loudest in this day and age" warns "This Day and Age," while "The Bland Within" seeks to lead by example in encouraging self-worth and knowledge. "District" finds Lou's old friends in law enforcement under the knife, while "Blown Away" suggests looking inward rather than to religion for salvation. Always a firm supporter but vocal critic of the hardcore scene, Lou condemns showgoers that bring "personal wars" and violence to venues and ruin it for everyone else on "Hello Pricks." Thoroughly professional but amazingly retaining a fire that makes it sound like a debut, Yours Truly finds Sick Of It All still at the top of their game after over a decade and damn close to the best hardcore band performing today. NIGHTWISH
Wishmaster
Century Media USA

The new full-length release by Finland's Nightwish entitled Wishmaster proves that heavy metal bands can have a lead "singer." From beginning to end, the female vocals of professionally trained opera singer Taraja Turunen will take your ears hostage while the melodic-style metal urges you to raise your lighter to the sky. The album Wishmaster has proven its originality and greatness by reaching number one on the Finnish charts and remaining there for three solid weeks on its path to going gold. The sound of Wishmaster is unmatched by any other album within the metal scene, as the perfect keyboarding along with the precise guitar and thump of the double bass drumming create a rhythmic masterpiece that all true metal fans will enjoy.

The opening track "She Is My Sin" and the title track "Wishmaster" sound like opera on steroids while "Two for Tragedy" and "Dead boys poem" will chill your soul with their emotional lyrics. The vocals on "Wishmaster" are as stunning as Taraja herself and will impress all of the two opera fans in North America, as well as the metalheads.

Nightwish was originally formed by keyboardist Toumas Holopainen as an acoustic project which due to his quest for originality, mutated into the melodic-metal that Nightwish is today. Other releases by Nightwish include Angels Fall First in 1997 and the breakthrough Oceanborn in 1998. Nightwish have been well received throughout Europe and hopefully they will receive the same deserved respect here in North America. On February 6, 2001 Wishmaster will hit the shelves in North America and will bring with it the much-needed breath of fresh air known as originality.(Anthony Gallerani)

X marks the spot: Mount Snow

For the millions upon millions of ESPN fans out there who are wondering what that ubiquitous little white rabbit is doing, sticking his head in on major sports broadcasts across the free world, your questions will soon be answered.

This bare will not venture into young children's hearts bearing plastic eggs and cold hard cash, instead the cottontail in question has been branded as the international symbol for this year's Winter X-Games being held at Mount Snow, VT.

This year's games will once again have a Bay State flavor to them as students from the University of Massachusetts will help to run the games as well as compete.

The marathon spectacle of supreme athleticism will cast a four-day shadow across Mount Snow. The myriad of innovative and daring events started this morning and will conclude on Sunday afternoon.

Hundreds of finely tuned, extreme athletes will venture to that cold place with the white stuff to compete in snowboarding, skiing, snowmobiling and the new Moto X.

Each of the four sports filter down into a plethora of different events that vary from a head to head competition to a challenge that is based on judges scores.

MATTHEW F. SACCO

Snowboarding will feature the men's superpipe, which was possibly the most memorable event of 2000. Massachusetts native Todd Richards took the gold in last year's final, besting Vermont's own Ross Powers.

Snocross will also be a highly anticipated event, as the man they call Superman, Blair Morgan, will look to keep his throne for at least one more year. However, young stud Tucker Hibbert and a motivated group of rivals will represent a major threat to the Man of Steel.

As expected, in today's world of high-flying envy, Big Air will headline the skiing events in the 2001 games. As the Winter X games grow, so expands the market, as some of the best skiers in the world will compete this year. 2000 Big Air champion, Candide Thovex, will look to remain atop as the prince of gravity defying performance.

Rounding out the list, hot off the show room floor, Is Moto X. There were many doubters when this very original idea was added to the X games roster but it has garnered much attention, as many masters of the dirt will be pioneering the white stuff this weekend. Mad Mike Jones will be among those riders to compete in the innovative new event, proving that excitement is a sure bet.

So all those X-treme fans out there who have a taste for excitement and a thirst for thrilling theatrics, only one thing needs to be said – follow the white rabbit.

Links or lynx? It's ice golf

It's a sad day. Co-Third and 48" editor Ryan Benharris had to sit this one out...actually he was suspended. And it's for the reason that he had to attend an intramural meeting for a "real" sport. Basketball. Ugh.

Maybe, just maybe, if he turns his act around and downs a gallon of whole milk in one hour, we just might let him back in the groove.

And remember, if you think you can inhale that much moo juice in the allotted amount of time, drop us an email at Thirdand48@yahoo.com.

Ice Golf

Uummannaq you.

When was the last time you were forced to take an unplayable because you were too afraid to approach your golf ball, which was sitting a mere three feet from the enormous paws of an Arctic polar bear?

Providence College sophomore and Ice Golf amateur Randy Ingham posed the following question: "Does Tiger Woods worry about being attacked by a flying squirrel? C'mon. You just have to put it out of your mind and take it one hole at a time."

Well, polar bear fear isn't a typical links scenario – but it's not entirely a stretch of the sporting imagination.

Icepacks and icebergs mixed with snow bunkers and frozen fairways will headline the World Ice Golf Championships that will be held on April 7-8, 2001 on the sea-Ice of Uummannaq (pronunciation was unavailable at press time) in Greenland, approximately 360 miles north of the Arctic Circle.

The championship is open to anybody with a handicap below 36. Sorry, Moon.

A huge plus is that before and after this historic championship, there will be organized trips to explore the mesmerizing landscape surrounding the city, where dogsledding and ice fishing are still an everyday part of the local verve. For more information, contact a local.

Mush, mush, mush...

"The sun shines and sitting on the hotel balcony in Uummannaq looking at the most amazing golf course in the world, makes you wonder if it is all real," Scottish photographer Fraser Ballantyne said. "But real it is, and if you are a golfer and are looking for the ultimate game, Ice Golf in Greenland is something not to be missed."

Last year, the winner was 32-year-old Annika Östberg of Denmark. A solidified traditional Danish golf champion, Östberg finished the 2000 tourney with a four round total of 154 strokes, seven ahead of Peter Masters, former defending world champion. It is rumored that after the loss, Masters cried, but the tears froze to her face.

"It was harder than I thought [it would be] to play," Östberg said. "But after the early rounds I got used to the course. The ice packs and icebergs are tricky obstacles. Luck and chance play a part, but ice golf is actually pretty close to traditional golf. I am thrilled to be the best in the world at ice golf. But it's really the experience itself that is so compelling. The icebergs, the fjord, the mountains and the light. It's indescribable."

Each year, Mother Nature and Father Ocean create a brand new course in January and February. The motion of the water shifts before the annual freeze tells the tale of the ensuing architecture.

We here in "Third and 48" land find it unjust that Mother Nature was dubbed from the all-time golf course architects list, found in a magazine on the coffee table in the Uummannaq Clubhouse.

Ice golf is fast becoming one of the most popular sports in Greenland, though you have to bear the Arctic weather to compete.

It should be a good game

There are a lot of things to look forward to when the average Joe Fan sits down to enjoy this year's version of "goal-capades."

There is, of course, the spectacle of speed and skill.

There are the magnificent, jaw-dropping saves.

There is the skills competition, and everybody's favorite: the old timer's game.

But what might be the most anticipated event of all, what might garner M.V.P. consideration is the P.A. announcer attempting to pronounce Nabokov and Cechmanek consecutively.

In the old East and West format for the All-Star game, the two sides were not drastically distinct. Each squad had speed, skill and strength. But now with the North America versus the World version we have in the present, the two teams boast radically different styles.

So, allow a few moments to delve into the inner catacombs of their souls, to find out the truth about the National Hockey League All-Stars.

First, a simple classification.

World: finesse players; wusses.

North America: strong players; goons.

The World All-Stars are a team teeming with speed, skill and puck handling ability. Jaromir Jagr is the world's best player and teammate and fellow sniper Alexei Kovalev will join him.

Joining the two Pens up front will be a pair of bruising, multi-talented Swedes in Peter Forsberg and Mats Sundin.

It better be freezing in Denver because the World squad has some burners up front including Pavel Bure, Ziggy Palffy, Alexander Mogilny and Sergei Fedorov.

The overseas squad is stacked on the blue line as well. Niklas Lidstrom and Sandis Ozolinsh could make three cans of tomatoes effective up front and having repo man Teppo Numminen to back them up isn't bad either.

Don't think that the foreigners are weak in net after the Dominator because "Captain Pronunciation" Evgeny Nabokov, and his trusty sidekick, Roman Cechmanek, are more than adequate.

The central focus of the North American team is certainly Mario Lemieux. Since he re-entered center stage two months ago, Lemieux has been hyped in every way possible. So, going into the mid-winter game, everyone will be asking, "what will Mario do in the All-Star game?"

Looking at the recent past, it is easy to decide that Lemieux will torch whatever defensemen face him, and it will be up to the goalies to steal away a couple of goals from the man who has taken the league by the throat.

The biggest surprises on the team are forwards Theo Fleury, Donald Audette and Bill Guerin. After a disappointing effort last year which left him the butt of the majority of jokes involving the Rangers, Fleury has answered the challenge of coach Ron Low and stepped up his game to such a level that he is now third in the league in scoring, behind only superstars Joe Sakic and Jagr.

Audette, many times an overlooked hard-worker in Buffalo has found his niche in Atlanta. He is currently tied for fourth in scoring with fellow All-Stars Ziggy Palffy and Doug Weight with 58 points.

Guerin was flying in Edmonton with Weight as his linemate, then got dealt to Boston, where he has added some much-needed scoring punch to the Bruins, who have been recently surging. He has 27 goals on the year, the third-highest total in the league.

So, as you sit down to watch this year's version of "defense-free" hockey, remember, it could be worse: you could be the PA announcer.

UMass continues hot streak over break

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Senior Chris Arsenault and the rest of the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team went into winter break on a two-meet winning streak and returned hot-as-hot.

Despite a span of 35 days between meets that could have led to some rustiness, the Minutemen were able to compile a 4-2 record over midseason to improve to 9-4 overall.

In their first meet since a 159-104 victory over UConn back on Dec. 9, the Maroon and White took first place at the Rhode Island Invitational in Kingston behind a strong showing in the four relay events. UMass won with 630 tallly 377 points, more than 100 better than its nearest competitor, Dartmouth. The Big Green scored 263 while LaSalle finished in third with 223. Host Rhode Island pulled up the rear with a score of 210.

The Minutemen won three of the four relay events and got a pair of victories from Arsenault in the 100-meter freestyle and the 200-meter Individual Medley en route to the victory.

The Minutemen picked up their first relay victory in the 400-meter medley. Sophomores Chad Arnold and Justin Houck teamed with Arsenault and fellow senior Mike Sabina to take the event with a winning time of 3:51.69. This victory was followed up with a similar one in the 200-freestyle relay.

Once again, Arsenault, Sabina and Arnold started along with sophomore Ryan Zaucha. The four combined for a time of 1:26.98, the fourth best time for the Minutemen this season. Finally, in the 200-meter medley relay, the foursome of senior Joe Martin, Sabina, Arsenault and Zaucha took home first place with a time of 1:37.70.

The Minutemen were just as impressive in individual events with Arsenault once again fronting the charge. He took first in the 200-meter Individual Medley with a time of 1:55.57 and then won the 100-meter freestyle in 46.75. Arsenault's time in the 100-meter free was not his best time of the season, but is still better than anybody else's time on the team.

Other individual winners for the Minutemen were Sabina in the 100-meter breaststroke (1:01.04), Houck in the 100-meter backstroke (54.70), Zaucha in the 200 backstroke (1:59.16) and freshman Peter Tawczynski in the 200 breaststroke (2:13.29).

Tawczynski's victory, along with a second place performance in the 400-meter IM over the weekend in Rhode Island earned him the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week Award. It was the first time the freshman from Holden, MA picked up the award this season.

One week after the victory in Rhode Island, the Minutemen were back on the road, this time traveling to Baltimore, MD for a tri-meet with George Washington and Maryland-Baltimore County. However, there would be no repeat first place performance this time, as the Minutemen crushed GW 204-90, but fell 162.5-135.5 to UMBC.

Sophomore Tommy Keane placed first in the 500-meter freestyle with a time of 4:44.74 and was named the A-10 Performer of the Week. Keane's time of 4:44.74 was good enough for the fifth best time in the conference this season. He currently holds the conference's fastest times in both the 500- and 1000-meter freestyle events.

Also taking first place for the Minutemen were Maryland native Logan Momar in the three-meter diving competition and Arsenault in the 100-meter freestyle. Alomar chalked up a score of 263.45 to take his event while Arsenault won his with a time of 46.85 seconds. Arsenault also placed second on the day in both the 200-meter freestyle and the 100-meter butterfly.

UMass' lone relay triumph came in the 200-meter freestyle relay. Arsenault combined with Chad Arnold, Mike Sabina and junior Ryan Fisher for a time of 1:25.74.

The loss to UMBC set the Minutemen out for revenge as they returned home for the first time since Dec. 2 to take on Rutgers. For added incentive, it was Senior Day at the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. Pool and the four Maroon and White seniors: Billy Brown, Arsenault, Sabina and Martin were looking for one last home victory.

However, it was not to be, as UMass fell to the Scarlet Knights 160-122, dropping their record to 9-4. Despite the loss, the Minutemen maintained their grip on first place in the A-10.

Arsenault once again led the way for UMass in his final home meet. He won both the 100-meter freestyle and the 100-meter butterfly. His times of 46.25 and 49.56, respectively, were good enough to earn him the A-10 Performer of the Week award. This was the third time that he has won the award this season.

The only other winners for the Minutemen were Brown and Keane. Brown took first in the 200-meter breaststroke with a time of 2:07.90 and also placed second in the 100 breaststroke. Keane followed up his Performer of the Week performance in Baltimore with a victory in the 200-meter freestyle (1:44.83) and second in the 500 freestyle.

Ryan Fisher and Justin Houck also had very impressive second place finishes. Fisher produced the sixth best time in UMass history in the 50-meter freestyle (20.96) while Houck clocked in with a time of 52.68 in the 200-meter backstroke, good enough for the second fastest time on the Minutemen this season.

The Minutemen return to action on Saturday when they travel to the Bronx, NY, to take on A-10 rival Fordham.

knock down those jumpers, the UMass frontcourt found its flow and put the game out of reach. Jackie Rogers abused URI's Andrew Wafula for 11 second-half points on 5-of-6 shooting from the field, and fellow forward Eric Williams pulled down a game-high 10 rebounds.

A late 20-point lead (60-40) allowed Flint to get his entire bench into the game. Crowd favorite Jameel Pugh made the most of his seven minutes by launching six shots (all of which missed) and freshman walk-on Dwayne Killings saw the first action of his collegiate career when he entered the game with 1:35 left and UMass ahead, 78-44.

The Amherst High grad grabbed two rebounds in his first floor time for UMass.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Kit Rhymer has been one of the big reasons for the turnaround of the Minuteman basketball team this season.

■ Flint

And if the toughness of the non-conference slate doesn't affect A-10 play anyway isn't this, in the words of our most famous b-ball grad, a "no-brainer?"

"I'll never play a cupcake schedule," Flint said. "We'll always play tough teams – I would just like to play them at home."

Flint points to his heralded predecessor, John Calipari, as giving the UMass team its identity as the consummate roundball road warrior. Of the school-record 35 wins that the Calipari-led 1995-96 team racked up, 26 occurred away from the friendly confines of the William D. Mullins Center.

The team took tremendous pride in winning on the road, a task made monumentally easier by the team's personnel at the time, according to then-assistant Flint.

"I blame Cal," Flint said. "That Any Team, Any Time, Any Place stuff is OK when you've got Marcus Camby and Lou Roe."

But the current UMass team has its own marquee player, whom Flint feels is as singularly responsible for the team's resurgence as anyone. Senior tri-captain Monty Mack has been nothing short of explosive in conference play, averaging 22 points over the team's seven victories. His 21 points in the first half against Rhode Island was one point less than the entire Ram team over the same period.

"Right now, Monty is the most valuable player in the Atlantic 10 by far," Flint said. "He's the biggest reason why we've been able to turn it around in the second half of the season."

And as long as Mack and company continue to dominate, they will continue garnering fans who more than likely were booing the team earlier this year. That brings up one aspect of the turnaround that Flint will cop to: the Minutemen learned how to pull together as one and shoulder the responsibility collectively instead of making excuses and pointing fingers. So even as the crowd on the bandwagon continues to grow, this team already has all the support it needs – from the inside.

"This is a fleeting business," Flint said. "When it's going good, you're going to have people in your corner. When you're doing bad, that's what you've got your team for.

"You just can't let it bother you. You've got to make sure your team stays on point."

Who's hot, who's not, who's got what?

The ups and downs of college hoops

The college basketball season is in full swing and springtime is quickly approaching, which brings April showers but more importantly, March Madness. As always, many teams have yet again secured their spot in the field of 65 (yes, you heard right, the great minds of the NCAA expanded the field to 65 teams starting this year). As is custom, Duke, Stanford and UNC are making their annual charge to become high seeds in the tourney.

But, as always, some teams have emerged as surprises around the country, while others have been a disappointment and not lived up to expectations. Here is just an abbreviated list of teams on the rise and teams on a downward spiral.

UP-AND-COMERS

Syracuse: The Orangemen have reached the Top 10 again after being left out of the Top 25 during the preseason. Preston Shumpert has been impressive all year for Jim Boeheim's club, averaging over 20 points a game. Dantonc Brown has also shined at the Carrier Dome, and he paired with Shumpert, has led the 'Cuse to a fast start in the Big East. When the tourney rolls around, the Orangemen very well might be singing their song from their '96 run, "The 'Cuse is in the house. Oh my God. Oh my God."

Alabama: The Crimson Tide are known more for their football than their basketball, but 'Bama has played some quality basketball as of late, despite being the subject of an NCAA investigation. A 5-2 record in the tough SEC has surprised many, with the team eclipsing more established programs in the conference, like Kentucky, Auburn and Mississippi State. Watch out for them come tournament time.

Fresno State: Where did these guys come from? A virtually unknown program before Jerry Tarkanian took over, "Tark" has turned the Bulldogs into a force to be reckoned with. Fresno has reeled off thirteen straight wins and is steamrolling through their early WAC foes. Despite losing Courtney Alexander to the NBA last year, Tark's crew is getting a balanced attack, with four players averaging double figures in scoring.

Boston College: Admittedly, the Eagles played a horribly weak non-conference schedule, beating up on teams such as Wofford, Brown and Marist didn't make believers out of too many people. But after defeating Miami twice and blowing out UConn, the cynics started to believe that BC was for real. Al Skinner's club has become a legitimate threat to win the Big East as Troy Bell has provided excellent play from the point and Kenny Harley has given the Eagles a rebounding presence and a backup scoring threat.

Massachusetts: Yes, the Minutemen started off with a thud and still have a losing record overall. But strong play as of late from the entire crew, especially Monty Mack and Kitwana Rhymer, has catapulted the Maroon and White into first place in the A-10. If UMass keeps running roughshod over the rest of its conference foes, the team definitely has a shot of gaining even an at-large bid in the NCAA tournament.

FALLING FROM THE HEAVENS:

Connecticut: Even the biggest of cynics could not have foreseen the horrendous season the Huskies are enduring. In Massachusetts, UMass fans are smiling, but our neighbor to the South is wondering what has happened to the team that won the national championship two years ago. Sound defeats to BC, Providence, and Villanova has left Jim Calhoun's troops reeling. Taliek Brown has not stepped up to fill the shoes of Khalid El-Amin at the point, and the young and inexperienced Huskies have not been able to completely take charge of a game at any point of the season.

Dayton: Picked by many to finish first in the Atlantic 10 and holders of a Top 25 spot at the beginning of the season, the Flyers have had their wings cut off after a hot start. Victories over UConn, Maryland, and Louisville gave hope to a dominant season, but since then Dayton has stumbled out to a 3-5 start in conference play, and its bubble soon may pop for an at-large bid if it hasn't already.

DePaul: The Blue Demons, generally a power in Conference USA, have tumbled all the way into the cellar in conference play and have not been able to get on track so far this season. With a 1-6 conference record, the Demons haven't been terrifying anyone, and the departure of Quentin Richardson to the NBA hurt the team tremendously. Bobby Simmons has been playing well for Pat Kennedy's club, but at this point DePaul won't even get an NIT bid.

Indiana: The Hoosiers were looking for a solid season under new head coach Mike Davis, but have sputtered on the way to a 3-4 start in the Big Ten. The Hoosiers celebrated a win over then No. 1 Michigan State three weeks ago, but since then have dropped contests to Michigan and Minnesota. Then, last Friday, former Hoosier Luke Recker dropped a 27-spot on his former teammates in a loss to Iowa. Indiana still has time to recover in time for a tournament berth, but with Ohio State and a Spartan team looking for revenge coming up, it's going to be tough.

Tournament time brings a smile to every fan's face but it also brings frowns to the players of teams that have their bubble burst. Right now, many teams are shaping up to garner an at-large bid, and since there are never enough seeds to distribute, falling teams have to either get their act together or accept a not-so-glorious bid in the NIT.

UMass ties dubious record

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Last night in Rhode Island's Keaney Gymnasium, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Joanie O'Brien watched her team tie a record she thought had been buried nine years ago.

The Minutewomen's 46-35 loss to the Rams matched the lowest scoring output for any O'Brien-headed UMass squad. The last Maroon and White 35-point crop was harvested in the 1992 Atlantic 10 Tournament when the Minutewomen lost 44-35 to Duquesne.

"The mistakes we made were mistakes that we forced on ourselves," O'Brien said. "We're running an offense with 1-2-3-4 options and if the first one didn't work then we just completely forgot what to do.

"It's a struggle with us sometimes," she continued. "Sometimes we look like we don't spend a day in practice. It just came down to composure."

The only bright spot for UMass was sophomore Jen Butler, who led the Maroon and White with 17 points and 11 rebounds. Butler's seven field goals, however, totaled higher than the combined amount of buckets made by her teammates.

"They're a team who always plays hard, that was never a question," O'Brien said. "But we had absolutely no composure. Obviously, when you score 35 points you have things that you need to deal with."

As a team, UMass (9-11, 4-5 A-10) shot 24 percent (12-50) from the floor and nine percent (1-11) from behind the arc.

Rhode Island (9-11, 2-6 A-10) did a bit better, nailing 35 percent of its shots from the floor, but the key to the Ram victory was on the defensive side of the basketball. UMass turned the ball over 28 times as Rhody strolled to its fifth best defensive performance in the school's history in holding UMass to 35 points.

"In the first half, we had ten three-foot shots and we didn't make any of them," O'Brien said. "We're our own worst enemy sometimes and tonight we definitely were that."

Junior Yatar Kuyateh and freshman Lindsey O'Neil paced the Rhode Island offense with 16 and 13 points, respectively. Kuyateh has now scored in double figures in 26 straight games.

With about four minutes left in the second half, O'Neil drilled a wide-open three-pointer from the left wing to put the Rams up by 10, 39-29. With that shot, so went the hopes of a Maroon and White victory. And as it had been for the first 36 minutes, UMass failed to mount even an inkling of an offensive spurt.

The second stanza began just as the first ended – with turnovers. The two teams combined for five giveaways in the first two minutes of play, proving that the sloppiness from the first half had carried over.

With 15:10 left, junior Vedrana Bajagic found Kuyateh on a backdoor cut to give the Rams a 24-19 advantage. On the next play, however, UMass' Ebony Pegues pulled-up short on a medium-range jumper and fell to the ground, clutching somewhere in the region of her left knee. She would return to the bench later in the game on crutches.

"She's in some pain so we're not going to make any comments about it until she sees the doctor tomorrow," O'Brien said. "Hopefully it won't be anything too serious but if it is, again, it's just something you have to deal with."

After Pegues went down, UMass failed to get any closer. With about nine minutes left in the contest, senior Kathy Coyner found Butler for lay-ins on two consecutive possessions to close the gap to seven, but O'Neil's wild one-hand hook of the glass with just under eight minutes remaining killed the Minutewomen's final march.

It didn't matter what type of shot it was; the Maroon and White simply couldn't put the ball in the basket. Coyner, who scored her 1,000 point on Sunday versus Fordham, went 1-for-12, while the streaky Amber Sneed connected only twice in eight attempts.

"We panicked in the second half," said O'Brien.

The game was ugly from the outset. With 9:08 left in the first half, the contest was tied at 9-9. And at that point, both squads had totaled 10 turnovers. Rhode Island took an 18-16 lead into the locker room at halftime.

On Jan. 9, the Minutewomen ousted the Rams in overtime at the Mullins Center by a score of 71-66. Last night, the Rhody defense held UMass to less than half of that winning output.

A key part of the Rhode Island defense was keying in on the Minutewomen post-production. URI did a solid job forcing Butler and Caroline Schils off of the blocks and into a jagged rhythm.

"We had some things we had to execute. We needed to try to get the ball to the blocks a little bit more and because our guards didn't do a good job executing, we didn't do a good job of getting the ball inside."

Coyner ended the game with a season-high nine turnovers.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen had a rough night in Kingston as URI topped them 46-35, despite Jen Butler's 17 point, 11 rebound performance.

All-Invalid Team For Eastern squad

The Eastern Conference will come fully equipped to the NBA All-Star game to accept the spanking that they will undoubtedly be administered. Simply looking at the starting lineup can foreshadow the fateful beating.

The power of the team will probably not be coming from Grant Hill or Alonzo Mourning. Hill brings an exhilarating 55 points, 5 steals and 2 blocks for the entire season before re-injuring the ankle that kept him out most of last year. His numbers are only slightly better than Mourning's game eggs, simply known as "Zo's Zeroes," that he has posted because he has spent the entire season in recovery for cancer.

How pathetic is it that one fifth of the NBA's All-Star starters have spent more time in the hospital than they spent on the court? Of course neither player is healthy enough to attend the game, let alone play. There is no truth to the rumor that Frankie Four Fingers from Snatch carried more votes than Latrell Sprewell.

The remaining three starters, Tracy McGrady, Vince Carter and Allen Iverson, round out a list of utter mediocrity. Leading the conference in votes, Carter brings less than half of the pizzazz and excitement that he brought last year. His claim as the NBA's best young talent is strongly decreasing, but due to an incredibly awful crop to choose from, he still stands out.

McGrady, who is basking in the glory of Grant Hill's absence in Orlando, has about as much of a claim to be an NBA starter as Julia Roberts does for a Best Actress award at the Oscars. Hell already froze over for McGrady, I guess that means we can prepare for an annoying acceptance speech from Queen Julia.

The rest of the team, which was announced Tuesday consists of Stephon Marbury, Theo Ratliff, Allan Houston, Anthony Mason, Jerry Stackhouse, Ray Allen and Glenn Robinson, and will be coached by Larry Brown from the 76ers.

Ratliff, Stackhouse, Marbury and Mason are given due props. Ratliff could have easily been passed over, especially in a place where Iverson constantly over shadows him. When Iverson isn't leading Philadelphia to the best record in the league, Ratliff is. He is quite simply the most underrated player in the NBA.

Stackhouse is by far the most deserving player on the team. It only took seven seasons, but he's finally putting up the numbers that he was expected to when he was drafted. Until now, he has just been an utter shame to the other talentless hacks who call the Dean Smith Center home. But now he's leading the league in scoring, which is refreshing after watching Shaq and Kobe fight over who can be the bigger ball hog. It will be even more amusing when Stackhouse beats out both crybabies to win the scoring title.

Latrell Sprewell was almost looked over, but along with Dikembe Mutombo was added yesterday. When left off of the list, Sprewell must have assumed that P.J. Carlesimo was coaching the team. Before he was added, it looked like the only representative from New York was going to be Allen Houston. That's unless Mars Albert decides to show up, rent a room, and chew on some soiled tighty whiteys.

Still left off the list was local legend Paul Pierce. Pierce's numbers, as opposed to the rest of the pitiful Celtics are enough to earn him a spot on the team. I suppose if being the best of the worst would make you good enough to make an All-Star team, then Elton Brand should be there because he is the main reason for the Bulls' six huge wins. I suppose coach Tim "Pink" Floyd is the main reason for the team's 57 big almost wins.

A more thrashing is about all of these jokers will be getting from the West. What else would you expect from a conference where two men who have played a combined total of four games can get more votes than half of the league?

The rebound continues against URI

Mack drops 29 in win

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Rhode Island's Zach Marbury, brother of New Jersey Nets All-Star Stephon Marbury, is living proof that pure hoop talent does indeed run in the family.

Unfortunately, so does losing miserably.

The Rams of URI did their best Nets imitation Tuesday night at the Providence Civic Center, committing 23 turnovers en route to a 78-46 loss to Massachusetts. Despite Marbury's team-high 22 points, the Rams failed to produce another double-digit scorer and were buried under a 29-point night from UMass' Monty Mack.

"We just wanted to come out here, play hard and jump on them from the start," Mack said. "Our goal was to take it to them hard in the first five minutes."

That critical opening stretch saw the Minutemen (9-10, 7-1 Atlantic 10) burst from the opening tip with an 11-4 run. Mack started the spurt with a layup off a Winston Smith steal, then canned a long deuce off a swipe of his own before connecting on a three-pointer from the right wing.

The preseason A-10 Player of the Year connected on eight of his first 14 attempts from the field, including four of seven from downtown.

Meanwhile, URI (5-16, 1-7 A-10) struggled mightily to find any semblance of offensive rhythm against the taller UMass lineup. Marbury, sophomore Howard Smith and junior Marcus Evans combined for six turnovers in the first 10 minutes of the game, and Evans missed back-to-back layups around the 15:00 mark.

The Detroit native followed his second miss with a frustration foul on UMass' Jackie Rogers, who flung his 250-pound counterpart to the floor while wrestling for the ball and was immediately whistled for a technical foul.

The heightening emotions seemed to spur at least one URI player, as Ram point guard Steve Mello knocked down a three from the left wing then picked Shannon Crooks' pocket and coasted in for a layup that cut the UMass lead to one, 11-10.

"I was worried because they've pretty much got three point guards out there," said UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint. "These are the kinds of teams we don't play well against."

Mack made URI's floor makeup a mere formality with 5:41 to play in the half, scoring seven straight points to push UMass' edge to 31-20. The Rams left the court at halftime having shot an ice-cold 28 percent from the field and accumulating more turnovers (11) than field goals (seven) over the first half.

The Minutemen's numbers at the break were borderline gaudy: 47 percent shooting from the field, including 5-of-10 from beyond the three-point line, and a 20-14 rebounding advantage.

Marbury got hot over the course of the second half, notching 13 points on perfect 4-for-4 shooting from the field and 4-of-6 from the charity stripe. The Rams ran a number of straight isolation plays with the junior guard (reminiscent of those the team used to run for Lamar Odom) but Marbury was often mobbed by three Maroon and White defenders once he made his way into the paint.

"When they get in the lane, they can finish," Flint said. "We wanted to stop dribble penetration and force them to shoot jump shots."

Jackie Rogers and the Minutemen were on cruise control against URI on Tuesday night. Things should be a little tougher this Saturday as Fordham invades the Mullins Center.

Why the rebirth?

He knew all along what he was doing.

He scheduled all of those brutal road games on purpose, to give his team the baptism by fire that has resulted in its Atlantic 10 rebirth. If he had access to some sort of round-ball time machine, there's no way he'd want to change a single date on the early-season slate that left the Massachusetts men's hoop team at 2-9.

Would he?

"I'd trade it in a minute," Coach James "Bruiser" Flint said. "When you're 2-9, I don't think that helps anybody."

So much for the master plan theory. Despite his team's 360-degree turnaround and subsequent climb to the top of the A-10, Flint dismisses the notion that learning how to lose taught this team to win. As a matter of fact, he says that there is no clear-cut answer, no secret recipe for UMass' sudden success.

"Everybody keeps asking me what we're doing differently now," Flint said. "We really haven't done much. We've slowed things down a little bit, we're being more patient and taking care of the ball by not turning it over. We'll still run when we have to, but we're trying to stay in control more."

The team may be in control of more than just the basketball, skeptics who called for Flint's firing not so long ago are pointing to the team's conference domination as the one possible way for the fifth-year coach to avoid an off-season dismissal. But was the team's early-season stumble really a by-product of poor coaching?

It seems at least possible that a lot of fans got caught up in the team's record and failed to look past how the Minutemen were losing to where they were losing.

"My thing about the schedule is that you've got to play at home," Flint said. "It's hard to win on the road in the first place, especially with who we've played – Carolina, Oregon, Marquette. It's tough to go out and win at those places."

An easy remedy for that, should Flint be back on the UMass sideline next year, would be for him to line up a slew of also-rans for the Minutemen to pummel over the first few months of the season. That way, they could enter A-10 play with a bloated overall record and not have to weather the storm of controversy that faced this year's squad after it dropped six straight heading into the holidays.

Teach-ins protest decline in UMass minority enrollment

By Tanya Mannes
Collegian Staff

The history of student activism on campus will be examined this weekend, in a series of teach-ins that will focus on the declining minority enrollment on campus since 1997.

The Student Coalition Against Racist and Classist Education (SCARCE) will lead a teach-in on the UMass campus in Campus Center rooms 804-808, from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. tomorrow and Sunday.

Using a workshop format, presenters will initiate discussions about the history of student organizing on campus, in order to provide perspectives on Asian, Latino, African-American, and Native American (ALANA) issues, specifically declining freshman enrollment of African-American students at UMass. Student activists will share their experiences and talk about how they influenced campus policy by taking over an academic building.

In March of 1997, over 150 students concerned with diversity issues seized control of the Controller's office in the Goodell building. After two days, Scott and the student negotiators agreed to a 21 point settlement.

SCARCE was formed in December of 2000 in response to concern about policies implemented by UMass president William Bulger, including projected budget cuts of between 10 and 15 percent for the University of Massachusetts. Members of SCARCE include undergraduate and graduate students, as well as organizations such as the Office of ALANA Affairs, Graduate Student Senate (GSS) and the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO). Non-students are encouraged to join.

"We want to provide historical background so that people can better understand the radical decline of ALANA students, and also discuss the effects of [UMass] budget cuts on minority students," said GSS president Thomas Taaffe, SCARCE member and one of the organizers of this weekend's teach-in.

According to the annual UMass Fact Reports, the amount of African-American freshmen enrolled at UMass decreased from 213 in fall 1997 to 124 in fall 1999, representing a 41.7 percent drop.

In addition, the amount of ALANA freshmen has declined 19 percent since fall 1997.

Other related topics for discussion will include the weakening of affirmative action and the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System (MCAS). Chancellor Scott's interpretation of the State Supreme Court's Boston Latin decision led him to discontinue most policies that used affirmative action principles as a basis for admission. Some students have voiced concerns that the MCAS tests will pose high and unfair standards that will prevent minority students from gaining admission to universities if the quota system is completely abolished.

The challenges of funding UMass' controversial distance-learning program will also be addressed, focusing on whether money will be taken away from student groups.

"Our goal is to educate people on the radical changes and whether UMass is fulfilling its mission statement, to provide access to education," Taaffe also said.

The UMass Amherst Mission Statement contains the sentence: "As a public university, we have a special responsibility to those whose background may have discouraged them from participating in higher education."

The onset of distance learning, the expected use of MCAS testing in college admissions standards and the steady dissolution of affirmative action are structural issues confronting UMass and similar universities, especially in Massachusetts. According to Taaffe, these issues are "changing the landscape of campus and undermining everyone's education."

Professor lectures about future electronic education

By Chris Thompson
Collegian Staff

Electronic and web-based communications can greatly enhance the educational quality of a college class, according to the Executive Director of distance and distributed learned at Virginia Technical College.

Speaking at Amherst College, Virginia Tech Professor Timothy Luke claimed that an electronic learning environment can encourage greater communication between student and professor than a traditional classroom setting.

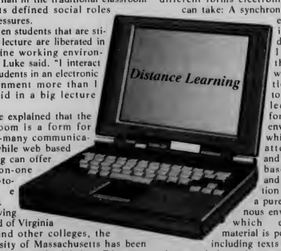
"I don't think this [web-based] technology is necessarily de-personalizing or disengaging, often it is this [lecture hall] environment that de-personalizes or disengages," Luke said.

> "I don't think this [web-based] technology is necessarily de-personalizing or disengaging, often it is this [lecture hall] environment that de-personalizes or disengages," Luke said.

According to Luke, web-based chats, bulletin boards, and email allow students to express themselves more freely than in the traditional classroom with its defined social roles and pressures.

"Often students that are stifled in lecture are liberated in an online working environment," Luke said. "I interact with students in an electronic environment more than I ever did in a big lecture hall."

Luke explained that the classroom is a form for one-to-many communication, while web based learning can offer one- on-one or few-to-one dialogs.



Following the lead of Virginia Tech and other colleges, the University of Massachusetts has been moving forward with its "Distance Learning" online course catalog in recent months, offering several online courses and scheduling the project's official launch date for Feb. 7. UMass launched the initiative partly as a way to generate revenue, an aspect of the project that UMass President William Bulger stressed in his visit to the Amherst campus in late September 2000.

But according to Luke, electronic learning, if properly prepared, is no bargain.

"I got involved with distance and Distributed Learning 10 years ago in the face of budget cuts, experts told us we could cut costs using technology, what we found was that it doesn't save money," Luke said.

What Luke did find was that electronic communication can offer students access to new information and provides a medium for communication that does not otherwise exist.

"Online communication promotes peer-cooperation work groups that are difficult to develop in a classroom setting," Luke said.

Luke went on to outline the three different forms electronic education can take: A synchronous learning environment in which students view a lecturer through a web connection, similar to the existing lecture hall format, a dual environment in which students attend lecture and provide web based material and communication forums, and a purely asynchronous environment in which educational material is posted online, including texts and is complemented through streaming audio-visual or communication mediums.

"The web allows audio-visual material to be presented to the students that simply cannot be communicated by a blackboard and chalk," Luke said.

Former UM quarterback arrested

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A former University of Massachusetts quarterback was arrested last month for allegedly assaulting another student in John Quincy Adams dormitory.

Richard Lucero, a Phoenix College transfer All-American quarterback, was expelled from UMass following his arrest on Dec. 19 and indictment in January on four separate charges – three misdemeanors of assault and battery and one misdemeanor of breaking and entering.

An emergency call came through to the UMass Police shortly after 12:30 a.m. on Sunday, Dec. 17, with accusations from the victim that an individual, later identified as Lucero, had broken and entered into his room without permission and assaulted him and his two friends.

The victim suffered chipped teeth, bruises to his face, and a laceration to his lip. His friends suffered minor injuries, but declined medical treatment.

Fearing that Lucero would not be returning to campus, police authorities obtained a warrant for Lucero's arrest. Two days after the incident had been reported, UMass Police arrested Lucero in his tenth floor room in John Quincy Adams Residence Hall.

The names of the victims are not being released, but according to police, the incident was not a random assault, but rather the victim knew his alleged assailant. Authorities failed to disclose any kind of prior dispute Lucero and the victim may have had in the past.

People in the building stated that the dispute between the victim and Lucero arose over the victim's hand disability. A male, who could not be identified by witnesses, allegedly started teasing the victim about his disability, sources confirmed.

According to the victim's statement to police, the following evening Lucero charged into his room and assaulted him and his two friends, while a group of men stood outside the door observing the incident.

"There were other individuals present at the scene, but our investigation to this point has revealed that they did not commit any criminal activity," Deputy Chief O'Connor stated, failing to indicate whether they had been identified by police.

Two football players who associated with Lucero declined comment regarding the incident, but stated that the incident had not been resolved and a trial is pending a future date.

Associate Dean of Students Gladys Rodriguez received a complaint by the victim against Lucero and without any consideration of his athletic title, issued his removal from the University. Dean Rodriguez is responsible for taking disciplinary action against students who violate University Code of Student Conduct

"I didn't take into consideration his being a football player," Rodriguez said. "When we receive a complaint of such magnitude, we have no other choice but to seek disciplinary action."

Food for children in Holyoke

By Melissa Hommel
Collegian Staff

Fewer children in the city of Holyoke are going hungry these days, thanks to a new program called Kids Cafe that is being offered through The Food Bank of Western Massachusetts.

The Kids Cafe, which will celebrate its grand opening in Holyoke on Friday, Feb. 9th, was developed several years ago when two young children broke into a kitchen in Florida to steal food because they were hungry, David Sharken, the Director of Food Bank, explained.

The incident in Florida created a public outcry and resulted in a program that worked to feed children. He explained that although there were already programs in place such as soup kitchens, there was nothing geared specifically towards children.

"This was the start of creating a program that gave hot nutritious meals to children in need," he said.

The city of Holyoke got the opportunity to have a program that provided hot meals to low-income children due to a grant provided by ConAgra. The city was specifically chosen because of the high number of low-income families that are in need of assistance.

The program, which is being run in collaboration with the Holyoke public school system, serves meals twice a week to nearly 300 area children.

Sharken explained that the Cafe serves meals to students in five after school programs. The meals are prepared by the Holyoke School System and are delivered by volunteers from Americore. Through this program it is expected that the number of hungry children within the city will be significantly reduced.

"Childhood hunger is a very real issue in our community," Sharken said. "The new Kids Cafe program is an important step toward ensuring that every child in Holyoke has enough food to grow up healthy."

The cafe will hold its grand opening ceremonies on the 9th at 4:30 p.m. in the United Congregational Church. To celebrate the opening, children from the Holyoke Boys and Girls Club, NEARI-Jump Start, Girls Inc. of Holyoke, Teen Resource Project and El Arco Iris will share a meal with Mayor Michael Sullivan, Darcy Zbinovec of Lightlife Foods (a ConAgra affiliate) and others. Also slated in the plans for the grand opening are a DJ to supply live music for the students and a nutrition educator that will give a demonstration about health.

The Kids Cafe program is run nationwide as a subsidiary of America's Second Harvest a group that supplies nearly 200 food banks and 150 food rescue areas. In addition, there are plans to open between 75 and 100 new Kids Cafe's across the country.

Four million children under the age of 12 in the United State go hungry daily and 9.8 million more children live in families who are at risk for hunger. In Western Massachusetts specifically, 51 percent of people served at the Food Bank are children.

"If we can get food to kids, we can possibly prevent lifetime problems," Sharken said. "This is a way that we can make sure that the children of Holyoke get the nutrition that they need."

UMass faces classroom crunch

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Cramped classrooms and frustrated students trying to get into classes were a staple of the first week at the University of Massachusetts.

According to the Registrar's office, the situation is getting better.

"I always hear a lot of things," Registrar Elizabeth Pyle said. "The balance is that things are better this spring than last spring."

There are common problems every year, the Registrar explained. Class density and population are continuing difficulties.

"In certain segments, there are always problems. Class years, some majors, even some classes are always problems," she said.

The Communications Department has always had problems, lamented undergraduate program director Carolyn Anderson.

"We have a perennial problem with the registration system," Anderson explained. "We have a lot of students coming in complaining. We have a large department and we are way understaffed."

The Communications department has over 1100 students according to Anderson, but only 16 faculty members.

"It's a horrific ratio," Anderson said.

Class density is not the only problem Communication majors face. Underclassmen often struggle to find classes because of senior's scrambling to complete the major.

"The hardest hit are the juniors, since the sophomore classes are large, and the seniors have priority. And the junior year writing classes are packed with seniors who need the class to graduate," Anderson said.

The History Department sees similar problems.

"We are all concerned about the pre-registration system," Professor Alice Nash said. "Many faculty are taking extra students. The only limit is safety regulations, fire codes and how many students can breathe in a classroom," Nash joked.

However, the Registrar claims that there is not much they can do about the problem. According to her, class registration is handled through the departments.

"People realize that we're not the department they are trying to get into, we just facilitate the process," Pyle said. "If people are trying to get into class X, they realize they need to go to the department."

The crunch isn't felt quite so fiercely in other departments, like the Plant and Soil Science program for example.

"We only have a problem with General Education students," Plant and Soil Sciences program director Deborah Picking said. "The Plant and Soil Sciences department is small, however."

"We've got about 150 students. The freshmen classes are the largest, and then everything breaks down into labs," Picking explained. "The labs only have about twenty students in them."

University students have had mixed experience when trying to get into both required and elective classes. John Hauser, a freshman Forestry major, considers himself lucky.

"I've never had any problems getting into classes," Hauser said.

Tanyalee Brown, a junior Legal Studies major, hasn't been so lucky. She explained that it is a crunch just to take a minimum number of credits.

"I was just trying to get in, and couldn't," Brown said. "I'm taking classes that I don't need. I have to take them just to be a full time student."

The Registrar's office, and the rest of the administration, is also finding it difficult to determine the exact number of students at UMass.

"The number changes everyday," said Andrea Ragoza, a Reporting and Data Specialist for the Registrar's office. "It really depends on the situations."

Registrar Pyle described the various circumstances that affect the population.

"There are voluntary and involuntary withdrawal factors. If a student has family problems, or maybe they see another academic opportunity, they choose to leave," Pyle said.

Involuntary withdrawal factors are also common.

"It could be administrative withdrawal, bills not being paid, or a severe discipline case resulting in expulsion," she said.

There are certain estimations of the population though, according to Joseph Marshall, Assistant Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, and Director of Enrollment.

"It's up this year compared to last year. It's still way too early. It's going to be about the same as last year," Marshall said. "The University processed 20,000 applications and enrolled about 3700."

Birth control insurance approved at NYU

By Lilit Baron
Washington Square News

(U-WIRE) – New York University administrators Wednesday agreed to expand student insurance plans to include birth control pills and abortion procedures, following concerns raised by students and the local chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

Beginning in August, all insurance policies offered by NYU will offer full coverage of all FDA approved oral and emergency contraceptives, contraceptive devices and abortions.

In the past, oral and prescription contraceptives could only be obtained for free from the Health Center if the situation was deemed "medically necessary." Under the old policy, unintended pregnancies were not considered "medically necessary."

Oral contraception is available, for a $15 fee, at the NYU Health Center.

Abortions are not performed at NYU medical facilities. Instead, students are referred to other facilities, including Planned Parenthood, for all abortion procedures.

Informed Students United for Reproductive Equity (INSURE); a student organization started by a group of female law school students first approached the University Health Services Department at the end of last semester to express their concerns over health care coverage. INSURE members were shocked to hear complaints that contraceptives and abortion were not covered by NYU insurance, said Malary Curran, a member of INSURE.

Determined to expand the coverage of NYU insurance plans, INSURE contacted NYU law professor Sylvia Law, who referred the group to the ACLU's Reproductive Rights Project. From then on, ACLU and INSURE members worked together to lobby the University.

Concerns about a lack of coverage for abortions and oral contraception had not been raised at NYU until INSURE approached administrators, University Spokesman John Beckman said.

University officials met repeatedly to discuss the students' requests, Beckman said.

Both INSURE and the ACLU have argued that the risk of unintended pregnancies is higher when oral contraceptive measures are not covered by University health insurance plans. NYU's failure to provide full coverage discriminated against female students, and placed a financial burden on them, ACLU members said.

"We are absolutely thrilled about the decision. It is wonderful for all women students on campus," Curran said. "It was an absolutely excellent choice by the University to offer a wide range of options for the female students in need."

The ACLU and INSURE say that by forcing female students to pay for the cost of oral contraceptives, they were sexually discriminating against them. Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 states that a ruling by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission finds that an employer's failure to provide coverage for prescription contraceptives when it prescribes other drugs and devices is dubbed as illegal sex discrimination. Head of the ACLU's Reproductive Rights Project Donna Leiberman said.

Under Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, the lack of coverage in the insurance plans violated federal law by discriminating based on sex at an educational institute receiving federal financial assistance, Leiberman added.

"It seems as though the legislative climate in the administration was heading in the same direction as the issues being raised," Beckman said. The University does not expect controversy to arise out of their recent decision, he said.

Grief continues over student's death

By Marijie Kosman
Northwest Missourian (Northwest Missouri State U.)

(U-WIRE) – Questions about the death of Northwest Missouri State University student Dustin McCurdy, a 22-year-old broadcasting major who died Jan. 23, are slowly being answered.

A preliminary autopsy report was released Wednesday. Nodaway County Coroner Tom Scarbrough and a forensic pathologist have ruled the cause of death to be an "overwhelming viral infection which caused a cardiac arrhythmia," or a stoppage of the heart. Meningitis was ruled out as a cause of death, and drugs and alcohol were not involved.

Eighty-five people gathered Tuesday night to remember McCurdy at a memorial service in the Student Union Ballroom. The service included his parents, roommates and girlfriend, Kim Kajok, sharing memories of McCurdy. Words like energetic, caring, fun loving and successful were mentioned throughout the service amid tearful farewells and emotional stories.

Roommate Colin Ricci shared one of his favorite memories of McCurdy, recalling an argument the housemates had gotten into. "Dustin came to us, with a tear in his eye, gave each of us a hug and told us he loved us," Ricci said. Story after story painted a picture of a busy, outgoing and funny man who made the people around him happy. "Dustin was the true definition of a leader," Kajok said.

Kajok and McCurdy met a year ago at KDLX, where they both worked. After offering her a ride home, McCurdy invited Kajok to a party. "We were hooked from that point on," Kajok said. "It's not a very romantic story, but it's very important to me." Kajok remembers her boyfriend as a selfless person who was involved in more than just broadcasting. He also played drums for a band in Massena, Iowa, called 4th and Main, worked part-time at O'Reilly's Auto Parts and always made time for the people he cared about. "He was a peacekeeper," Kajok said. "He cared about everyone around him and he wanted the best for everyone."

Grieving is made easier knowing that McCurdy lived his life to the fullest, Kajok said. "The easiest part is knowing that he fulfilled his life, he was always happy and he died in peace," Kajok said. "He never struggled, and he was loved by everybody. That's what everybody wants in life, but he achieved it at a very young age."

Although physically gone, Kajok said she still sees signs that McCurdy is around. McCurdy had a habit of burning candles while he studied or slept, Kajok said. "I looked in his room at four in the afternoon the day after he died and there was one candle burning," Kajok said. "He had always saved a candle for me to blow out. It was sitting there, and I tried blowing it out and on the third try, it finally went out. My mom said that was Dustin saying let me go, I'm here. That impacted me so much. He was there, watching over me. I know that now.

"I thought I was going to go through this alone, but now I know that he's with me. I think my healing process might be a little faster because he's here, giving me little symbols."

A bell ringing will take place at 11 a.m. Friday at the Bell of '48.

Take steps to stop the class crunch

How many of you reading this are satisfied with your schedule?

How many of you feel that you are receiving the education that you had in mind when you signed up to attend the University of Massachusetts? When you paid your tuition? When you set your college goals?

Fewer and fewer every semester.

The crunch for class space this semester is as bad as it has ever been at UMass, and probably even worse. Everywhere people are bitter and full of spite, unable to gain access into the classes required for the completion of their majors, for their final gen-eds – for what seems like any class at all.

This must end.

Students signed up to attend the University with specific ideas in mind, with specific goals of what they wanted to accomplish, to learn. The ideas and goals are being stymied for even the most dedicated students, and through no fault of their own.

The overflow of students and the undercutting of departmental budgets has crippled the ability of the average student to gain access to their necessary classes. The graduation date of many is being pushed back. Unnecessary classes are being taken as a last resort to remain a full-time student and not be removed from campus.

It is time for the University to take steps to rectify this situation and ensure that each and every student has the opportunity to pursue their education with the maximum amount of efficiency. The students who worked so hard to get here in the first place and who push themselves to be the very best collegiate scholars they can deserve no less from the institution which they support.

The budget cuts, which are crippling such departments as Spanish, must come to a close. They help nothing and endanger the educations of thousands of students – not only departmental majors, but those who are using the department to fulfill minors or basic language requirements which are necessary for graduation from the University.

The overflow of students being admitted into the University must also end. The struggle for housing that dominated campus life last year has been alleviated, but not eliminated. There are still too many students trying for a limited number of campus resources and classes. More selective admissions may be the answer to that, or a simple cap on the number of admissions, but either way something must be done, and done soon.

For one single student to have to stay an extra year or semester, with the waste of time and of money which this entails, is completely unacceptable. For an SOM major to have to take Geology because it is the only class open completely ruins the idea of college as a place to grow and to expand your own personal interests. Instead replacing it with a place where one simply takes what one can so as not to be removed from housing or from the University altogether.

UMass can improve itself in these matters, but only if the administration makes a concerted effort to do so. End the budget cuts, rebuild the departments, add classrooms, and acts with the best interests of the students in mind and the current crisis and all the frustration which accompanies it will be greatly averted.

Time is running out to apply for the columnist job! Come to the Campus Center Basement soon!

No deals on meals

The web site greets you enthusiastically: "Welcome to University of Massachusetts campus dining. Have we got a plan for you. Our all new and very popular Your Campus Meal Plan is designed for commuter students, juniors, seniors, graduate students, and faculty and staff!"

The Your Campus Meal Plan (YCMP) can be used both at the dining commons and at any of these retail stores on campus: The Hatch Food Court, Bluewall, The Coffee Shop, Starbucks Coffee Cart, Physical Plant Snack Bar, Whitmore Snack Bar, and Hampden Snack Bar.

Unfortunately, it's a rip-off.

None of the campus dining plans seem to offer a particularly great deal. Dining Services offers two sets of meal plans: the Resident Meal Plan and the Your Campus Meal Plan. Freshmen and sophomores living on campus are required to get one of the Resident Meal Plans. After the Deluxe Meal plan ($1174 a semester for unlimited meals), the largest plan is the Value Meal plan which, at 224 meals for $1076, costs about $4.80 per meal. The 160 meal, $950 Basic Meal plan is the next smallest meal plan after the Value plan and the smallest of the three Resident Meal Plans; it costs an average of about $5.94 per meal.

SCOTT ELDRIDGE IV/COLLEGIAN

The largest Your Campus Meal Plan is almost the same size and almost the same price as the Basic Resident Meal plan. The 154 meal Economy Meal plan costs $949, for an average of about $6.16 per meal. Notably, you can only exchange a meal for a maximum of $5.50 worth of food at non-dining hall locations. Thus, those meals you do eat at the dining common are pretty expensive. For example, if you get the Economy Meal plan and eat half of your meals at the dining commons and half at "meal exchange" places, you are effectively spending about $6.82 per meal in the dining commons. (You would be better off getting the next smallest YCMP, the Commuter Meal plan, and using it exclusively at the dining commons, paying cash at other locations.) The fewer meals you eat at the dining commons, the worse (financially) the YCMP deals get – which seems to defeat the purpose. In fact, if you get the 'Economy' YCMP and never eat in the dining commons, using all your meals at other locations instead, you are donating over $100 to Dining Services. And if you were to eat every one of your 154 meals in the DC, you would as well off with the Basic Meal plan.

BENJAMIN MELANÇON

With the 79 meal, $485 Commuter Express plan you receive fewer meals than the Economy Meal plan but for some reason the average price of a meal goes down, to about $6.14. The smallest meal plan available, YCMP's Light, gives you 35 meals for $225, or about $6.43 per meal.

All of the YCMPs cost well over the $5.50 per meal that they are worth outside of the dining commons. Apparently, Dining Services nets upward of sixty cents every time you use YCMP at a non-dining common location. One must also remember that using a YCMP meal at a campus retailer and spending less than $5.50 means losing the difference (to the place you buy the food, at least, and not to Dining Services, according to a Blue Wall employee). This is a minor annoyance, at best, and it almost inevitably makes using the Your Campus Meal Plan on your campus still less advisable.

Because the Residential Meal plans don't include one for under 160 meals, a YCMP option may be your best choice if you want to eat in the dining commons under 150 times this semester. But you are being robbed by Dining Services' crazy idea of economies of scale (as are people who purchase the Basic Meal plan). Or maybe Dining Services banks on no one ever using all the meals on the larger meal plans.

Dining Services should stop trying to force people to buy more meals than they need (and more meals than they will probably use) by precipitously increasing the price per meal as the number of meals drops. Dining Services should allow people to buy any number of meals at a fair price. Furthermore, I don't feel that it should be almost prohibitively expensive to enter a dining common with cash.

As it stands now, if you plan on eating at the dining commons a lot, your best bet financially is to get a Resident Meal plan and spend cash if and when you want to eat at the other places available through the Your Campus Meal Plan – no matter how often you wish to eat at the covered retail food outlets. There is no such thing as a YCMP for under six dollars per meal, so every time you use it outside of the dining halls (for a maximum value of $5.50 a meal) you lose money as compared to paying cash.

If you are planning to eat at the dining commons some significant number of times under 150 meals, a YCMP may be your best bet. If you want to eat at the places on campus that are part of YCMP and intend to go to the dining commons only rarely or not at all then you are much better off spending just cash. In general, you want to get the smallest plan that will cover all the times you want to eat at the dining commons and pay-when-you-buy elsewhere.

There is another way to pay for meals in advance in the Amherst area. The Off Campus Meal Plan (OCMP), from a private company, ranges from about $6.07 per meal if you order 266 meals at once to about $6.58 per meal when you get only 35 meals at the same time. Participating businesses are required to provide you with $5.75 worth of food per meal; OCMP suggests that they might give you more. This means that you either lose money or else the restaurant you eat at is subsidizing your meal (or some combination of the two). You get no guaranteed benefit for paying for a whole lot of meals up front. Included in the restaurants participating in the Off Campus Meal Plan are the following on campus establishments: Earthfoods, Greenough snack bar, Newman Center, and Sylvan snack bar. Apparently, you cannot use the YCMP at these places.

None of the plans from anybody lets you carry meals over to the next semester. Since paying cash at the dining commons means paying ridiculous prices for meals, if you plan to eat there regularly you have to get a meal plan through Dining Services. (The price may not be great and the hours short, but I think the food is good – and improving – and it is all-you-can-eat.) As for eating away from the dining commons, I suggest that you set aside the money that you would spend on YCMP or OCMP, strictly forbid yourself from using that money to have pizza delivered, and dedicate that money to the pleasurable task of hitting every local restaurant you can, on campus and off— going back to the places you like, and never having to care who accepts what meal plan or how many meals you have left. YCMP and OCMP are most useful for their lists of retail food outlets— which you can get at their web sites without laying down a cent.

GEORGE THOMAS

Now that the new year has come and brought the new president –three cheers for that – it seems time to hold some people to their promises I have in mind all those many, many, pseudo-intellectuals and entertainer types – Alec Baldwin, for example – who promised they'd leave America if Bush were elected. Well, why are they still here? I'm thinking that we should make them a deal. We'll buy every person who said that a one-way ticket to any place in the world – so long as they go. Of course, those who insisted they'd leave if Bush were elected were just shooting their mouths off, but we should ask them to put their money where their mouths are.

Consider it. As a public policy measure, the expense is simply too cheap to pass up given the return. It's a price America should eagerly pay. If we could only get the cast of West Wing, and everyone who writes for Salon.com to join Alec, we'd be in serious business. True, we'd miss Christy Turlington's face – well, mostly those Calvin Klein underwear ads, except for those of you who think that underwear ads are a more serious business than Clinton getting off with an intern – but that's a small price to pay. Imagine a world without these people – finally, no Alec Baldwin. I know, we'd miss the heady intellectual discourse. Maybe we could enlist Adam Sandler to take his place. If not, I have a three-year-old niece who likes Dr. Suess. She'd have to cut down on the number of books she reads each week, but other than that she'd be up to it.

There would be one serious downside. I don't know what I'd do for entertainment anymore. No, not the movies. (Yeah, I'm rushing off to the movies 'cause those Baldwin boys are such great actors.) I'm talking about my daily dose of errant nonsense.

Since the election, I've become addicted and the left has done a great job of providing my fix. They're simply hysterical over W.'s win and are trying to convince all of us that he's an idiot. Well, someone is here, only, it turns out it's not W. (Just who's quoting astrological predications anyway?) Even the normally reasonable have gotten into the act. Michael Chabon, a very good novelist, goes nuts over W.'s cutting international abortion funding, as if this is an extreme act that will bring a quick end to abortion rights in America. Even if W. could somehow, single-handedly, overturn Roe v. Wade tomorrow, which of course he can't, abortion would not come to an end. In a state like Massachusetts, almost nothing would change. But to suggest as much requires reasoned discourse. Michael Sandel, a professor of government at Harvard and author of an excellent book on American democracy, says that given how close the election was, W. shouldn't get to pick his own cabinet. So in really, really close elections, Article II of the Constitution doesn't count. Er, right. For this, he should flunk poli sci 101. And these are the mild cases. Remember all those hysterical predictions that when the Florida votes were recounted after the election, it was going to look very strange when Gore got more than Bush? A few Florida newspapers have conducted recounts, based on Gore's own, ahem, standards. Turns out even then W. got more votes. The New York Times and Washington Post failed to report this, revealing that the truth is no longer an intellectual virtue.

Liberal intellectuals, or a great many of them at any rate, seem to have a twofold problem. One, being intellectuals, they aren't really interested in discussing issues and engaging in argument. Yes, that's supposed to be what intellectuals do, but that's just myth. Intellectuals already have all the answers: what's the point of discussing something when you already know the answer? What they want is for you to take their advice, no questions asked. And when you don't, rather than argue with you (as that takes a lot of effort and you may poke holes in their argument) they call you stupid. If Bush won't listen to them, then he must be a fool (their world depends upon it). That's some impeccable logic. It's like brainwashing: if they just repeat their case enough, we're bound to believe it, worn down by sheer repetition. Some of you will recognize this technique, perfected by the academy.

Two, liberal intellectuals assume that the only virtues are their own. This is the funniest thing about their criticism of W. For them a president must be an intellectual, a man of talk, or at least a pseudo-intellectual who pretends to read serious books (you remember Al "my favorite novel's The Red and the Black, which I haven't read in twenty-five years" Gore). But this isn't the case in the presidency; indeed, the very virtues that might make for a great academic or writer would be utter disaster in the White House. The intellectuals, however, wrapped up in there own world, fail to see this. Of all things, they lack perspective!

Perhaps a bit of distance will provide them with some: so let's round 'em up, pay their airfare and say bon voyage; it'll be the first great act of the 21st century. Let the new millennium be Baldwin free.

Dafoe, Malcovich shine in uneven Vampire

SHADOW OF THE VAMPIRE
Directed by E. Elias Merhige with John Malkovich, Willem Dafoe

Cinema verité is a belief that film should be a window to the outside world, rather than a mirror merely reflecting it. The awkwardly freakish Shadow of the Vampire takes this idea one step further, positioning film as an actual recording of real life events. Perhaps even trickier, the movie – which is about making a movie – must convince the audience of its reality through the medium of film.

Don't worry: my head is also spinning in circles thinking about that series of relationships.

As such, Shadow of the Vampire builds a mountain of internal logistical problems that no amount of stunning visuals and brilliant makeup (both of which there are plenty) can overcome. The movie worries too much about moving from place A to place B and drifts too far from its characters. In the end, we are left with empty shadows of characters, whose transformations might have been interesting had they been treated with more attention.

For example, the eccentric, elusive director Murnau (John Malkovich) is quite obviously mad by the film's end. And while the final moments of the film are equally disturbing and compelling as a result of this madness, we never see how Murnau gets to this point. The movie never convinces us that his drive or his passion for this film, for this project, are enough to drive him to such callous, disaffected behavior. The transformation is altogether too sudden.

Likewise, the film's most compelling character, Count Orlock (a.k.a. Max Shrek, a.k.a. Count Dracula, a.k.a. the vampire) is never used as more than a circus exhibition. What makes Dracula, Frankenstein (and I'm presuming Nosferatu) compelling stories is the ability to humanize these (on the surface) monsters. Indeed, nothing is more powerful than the capacity for human emotion. Orlock has almost no human emotion – save lust. A vampire is supposed to have lust, though; it's not nearly enough to make Orlock sympathetic. Thereby, Shadow of the Vampire fails on two parallel levels – in its own reality, and in the making of Noferatu's reality.

The opening of the movie tells us the whole story, which isn't exactly helpful for creating any drama. That is, the famous German director Murnau has been denied the rights to Bram Stoker's Dracula, so he decides to shoot the film anyway, only changing the name. Nosferatu-Eine Symphonie des Grauens becomes the most "realistic" vampire film ever and establishes Murnau's greatness. Shadow of the Vampire follows this outline almost exactly. The conflict arises when the director will not tell his crew who is to play the titular character in his film. After the all-too-real Shrek assumes the part, his unusual methods cause much unrest on the set. As the filming continues, Murnau's unholy bargain with the unfathomable Orlock sends the film's conclusion only further into doubt.

John Malcovich and Willem Dafoe star in Shadow of the Vampire.

In between the moments of this rather listless plot, however, there are some true cinematic gems. Dark humor surrounding Orlock abounds. Indeed, Willem Dafoe's portrayal of the vampire is truly one of the most inventive pieces of acting in recent memory. It's hard not to credit the brilliant make-up at least somewhat for the authenticity of Orlock. The costume was grotesque, horrifying and just plain freaky. Indeed, I would expect the film to be nominated for several makeup and costume Oscars. That said, Dafoe, underneath his costume, brings the beast to life with his lurching walk and snirking grimaces. He's truly a wonderful spectacle to watch.

And along these same lines, Shadow of the Vampire comes up with some wonderfully stunning visuals. While the movie does not take advantage of its frequent fades to black and white, it does make much use of color contrast. The cinematography, at times, is nothing short of breath taking.

However, Shadow never manages to overcome the complexities of its plot. More accurately, it never really investigates them at all. Good ideas and even the right outcomes are there, but the middle is simply missing. The movie is never consistently frightening or funny. Rather, most of it just lingers kind of aimlessly, not really accomplishing much. The human emotion, if you will, is almost completely absent.

Willem Dafoe is absolutely brilliant and deserves an Oscar nod. John Malkovich is underused. The cinematography is inconsistent. The plot is simply not worth it. Shadow of the Vampire could have been very good, but never makes us care about its characters or stories— and that is not the way to make a vampire film.

Super Bowl / Survivor ignite the small screen
